PUBLISHERS' NOTE

Though not as antique as to sink into oblivion, Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepāl by Rājendralāla Mitra is familiar only through auditory campaign. The book can hardly be found at stacks of libraries in readable condition ; nor is it easy to procure a copy of the same even at a fancy price. It is a great pleasure on our part that at last we have succeeded in placing this invaluable book at our learned reader's desk. Our plan to reprint this rare book, though undertaken long ago, remained suspended for want of a copy until Dr. Alok Ray of Scottis h Church College acceding to our request, entirely out of missionary zeal, lent us the very private copy used by Rājendralāla himself. Besides that, Dr. Ray who is an authority on Rājendralāla has kindly contributed an introduction to the present edition. Unfortunately enough, the book has been irretrievably damaged while undergoing the process of printing. Our regret remains dumb beyond the comprehension of any vocabulary. We are also indebted to Sri Ramakanta Chakrabarti for several valuable suggestions.

Transliterations of Sanskrit proper names were extremely ill-assorted in the original edition. Though we had tried to square them all, some slips, we are aware, are still there. For these and other errors the publisher craves indulgence of the erudite readers.

INTRODUCTION

RĀJENDRALĀLA MITRA (1822-91)

Rājendralāla is more familiar to modern Indologists than his works. His numerous writings, including the first editions of his books, have long been out of print. The copies kept in the libraries are yellow with age, and mostly too brittle to be useful. There was, however, a time when these books were cherished as treasures. Some of these books, such as, The Antiquities of Orissā, Buddha Gayā, Notices of Sanskrit Manuscripts, and the Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepāl, are still highly esteemed. One may, of course, easily see the defects of these books written in the nineteenth century. They lack comprehensiveness. They do not satisfy the curiosity of the modern students of Indology. Their textual presentations and their critical apparatus seem rather useless in this age of sound methodology. The interpretations of Rājendralāla and his confreres have been rendered obsolete by new discoveries of facts and materials. Despite these and other short-comings, these books are yet to be cherished as priceless works. Their defects should not make us indifferent to their intrinsic worth and basic importance.

In the nineteenth century, the great impetus for social and moral progress sprang from a new spirit and a new way of life. The social and the intellectual movements of the last century were marked by a wonderful harmony of progressive thought and action. The consonance of idea and action is best seen in the lives and the works of men like Rāmmohan, Vidyāsāgar, and Rājendralāla. The force that led them onward was born of a new and fresh sense of human values, which may well be compared with European humanism that first flowered in the Renaissance of the fourteenth century. But here a word of caution is imperative, one should carefully weigh the merits of the trite generalizations on which such historical comparisons are usually built up. As Atulchandra Gupta has put it, "It would be worse than useless, or quite misleading if, owing to this similarity of names, we try to find out to our satisfaction—and such attempts rarely fail—deeper and real similarities between the Great European and parochial Bengal Renaissance in their causes and development." (Studies in the Bengal Renaissance, 1958, Intro. p. XI) of the nineteenth century. But although the Bengali efflorescence was not as vastly consequential as the much earlier European Renaissance, yet, at least in the sphere of antiquarian research, it revived the interest in the wonder that was India. The essentially European concept of Studia humanitatis had a new lease of life in Bengal, where it was persistently cultivated by great scholars like Rājendralāla Mitra. A new wave of Indological research resulted in the discovery of many old manuscripts, the re-editing of extant texts, and the re-assessment of the historical facts and mythical fictions. Rājendralāla was the foremost of the scholars who diligently paved the way for further investigations into archaeological, numismatic, paleographic, philological, sculptural and Sanskritic subjects. Rājendralāla, the leading student of Indology, was a true savant of the age. He was a 'humanist' in the best sense of the term. But here we must note that he was never exclusively pre-occupied with Indology. A man of diverse interests, Rājendralāla was versatile both as a thinker and a writer. In several parallel spheres of activity, his success was simultaneous. Like his famous contemporaries he was trained to view things broadly and generally. His synoptic approach did not help him achieve a viable synthesis in his multifarious enquiries which were rooted in inter-related disciplines. The prevalence of a general view in his writings makes them look incomprehensive, incomplete, unfulfilled. But once we ignore this particular defect of his works, we will find that he shed a new light on subjects ranging from politics to literary criticism, from social reform and administration to education and journalism. His versatility was admired by Rabindranath Tagore; the great poet described the great scholar as 'Savyasācī' (सव्यसाची) or Arjuna, the ambidextrous hero of Mahābhārata. Tagore praised his many-splendoured genius in the following words: "The chief glory of Rājendralāla did not lie with his intellect alone; his countenance was, as it were, a true index of his inner humanism." Jivan Smṛti, 1962, p. 128). The many-sided ability of Rājendralāla was comparable to the brilliant Umo universale, the ideal figure of the European Renaissance.

I.

'Mitra' was the clan-name of Rājendralāla's family which was old and respectable. Rājendralāla was the twenty-fourth descendant of Kālīdāsa Mitra, the founder of the family who was said to have come to Bengal from Kanauj. This fact is known from the elaborate genealogical tree reconstructed by Rājendralāla himself.

Rājā Pitāambar Mitra, a notable grandee of the imperial court of Delhi, was Rājendralāla's great grandfather. An imperial Sanad bestowed on him the hereditary title of 'Rājā Bāhādur'. He owned the jāghir or hereditary fief, of the district of Kurrah in the Doab. In 1781, he helped Warren Hastings quell the revolt of Chait Singh, the Rājā of Benares. Hastings appreciated his help and loaded him with honours. Pitāambar Mitra returned to Calcutta in 1787 or thereabouts with a goodly number of Sanskrit manuscripts from the Rājā's palace at Banares which had been occupied by the English.

Rājā Pitāambar's fortune was squandered away by his son Bṛndā-banchandra, who was given to charity and luxurious living. He was a friend of Rājā Rāmmohan Roy ; he had also some regard for the ideals of the Brāhma Samāj.

Janamejaya Mitra (1796-1869), Rājendralāla's father, lacked the share of the family fortune. He lived in a quiet garden-house at Surā in the suburbs of Calcutta. He was a man of letters. A number of scholars praised the high quality of his writings.

Rājendralāla Mitra was born on February 16, 1822. He got his early education at a Pāthśālā where he learnt Bengali and Persian. Later he studied at two schools. One of these was the English School of Khem Bose which was located at Pāthuriāghātā. The other was the Hindu Free School of Govindachandra Bysāck. At the school-stage, he showed much promise. Next he became a student of the Medical College. He was given a scholarship. He also won many prizes and distinctions. Prince Dwārkānāth Tagore wanted him to go to England with some other students for higher medical studies. Rājendralāla was willing to go to England. But his father would have none of it. He was afraid of the prevalent Hindu taboo on sea-voyages to, and sojourn in, the land of the Europeans. The slightest disregard of the ban was sure to lead to misery in the form of social ostracism.

Baffled by the ban on foreign travel, Rājendralāla remained at Calcutta, and diligently studied both Medicine and English. One Mr. Cameron taught him English. A painful incident in his career was his expulsion from the Medical College on May 12, 1841. Some students of the college had earlier been expelled for excessive truancy. Rājendralāla was asked by the authorities to disclose their names. He had kept mum, and he too was expelled. He next turned to legal studies. He was a keen student of law, and was soon prepared for a 'law examination'. But the test was never held. He could never be a doctor. And he could never be a professional lawyer. Yet, according to C. E. Buckland, "this knowledge of law and medicine afterwards enabled him to elucidate many doubtful points in the course of his subsequent literary and antiquarian researches." (Bengal under the Lieutenant Governors, Vol. II, 1901, p. 1060)

Undaunted by these reverses, Rājendralāla went on learning languages. He learnt Persian, English, Sanskrit, French, German, Greek and Latin. The knowledge of so many languages made it easy for him to be engaged in serious Indological research at the Asiatic Society, where he had the job of a librarian. He was also its Assistant Secretary from November 1846 to February 1856. Being an important functionary of the society, he could be intimate with many distinguished European Scholars who soundly schooled him for research. From 1847 onwards, he contributed to the Proceedings of the Asiatic Society and wrote articles for the Society's Journal. His contributions to the Proceedings and the Journal amounted to more than a century of scholarly articles.

In 1885, he was elected the first Indian President of the Asiatic Society. He had already been elected its Vice-president. Rājendralāla's election to the Presidential position betokened the recognition by the world of scholarship of his admirable erudition which was amply evidenced by his Indological research. Sir A. W. Croft, who presided over the meeting held by the Society to condole his death, said the following about Rājendralāla's association with the Asiatic Society : "His connection with this Society, extending over nearly half a century, was of a quite exceptional character. Entering it when a young man, as assistant Secretary and librarian, his commanding abilities and untiring industry soon brought him to prominence ; and while we may congratulate ourselves that it was this society which first gave him the opportunity of satisfying his inexhaustible craving for knowledge, we must gratefully admit that he has amply repaid the debt by the contributions that he has made to oriental learning, and by the lustre that his name and attainments have shed upon the society, of which he was one of the most distinguished in the long roll of Presidents." (Proceedings of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, August 1891, p. 112)

Quite a number of books written by Rājendralāla were published by the society in the Bibliotheca Indica series. The Society's other publications, too, included some other works of the great scholar, who wrote the 'History of the Society' for its Centenary Review of the Asiatic Society (1884).

Rājendralāla was appointed Director of the Wards' Institution in 1856 when it was established by the Government. That residential school for the minor chiefs and Zemindars was served by him wellnigh for twenty five years till its final closure. As a Director and teacher of the institution, he did his duties so well that his pupils later remembered him with respect and gratitude.

He was also associated with two educational societies which published books for school boys, and distributed them freely or sold them cheap. One of them was the School Book Society which had been founded in 1817. The society published books written in English and oriental languages. Rājendralāla's association with it probably began from 1856. He was one of the ten members of the Society's Committee (vide, The Eighteenth Report of the Proceedings of the Calcutta School Book Society, 1856).

The other society was founded in 1850. It was known as the Vernacular Literature Society, or, the 'Bengali Family Library'.

He wrote many text-books for these two societies, which published them. His books drew praise for their excellence. The books were used as text-books by generations of Bengali school-students. The School Book Society published his Prākṛta Bhūgola (1854), Patra Kaumudī (1863), Vyākaraṇa Prabeś (1862) and numerous maps and atlases drawn by him. His map-drawings were "the first work of its kind in Bengal". The Vernacular Literature society published Śilpika Darśana (1860), Mebārer Rājetibṛtta (1861), Śṛījīr Caritra (1860), Bibidhārtha Saṃgraha (1851-60), and Rahasya Sandarbha (1863-68). The last two publications were the earliest illustrated magazines in Bengali, which were edited by Rājendralāla on behalf of the Vernacular Literature Society. The journals dealt with all subjects. They have a special importance in the history of Bengali literature, because they reviewed the old and contemporary Bengali writings. The reviews were composed by Rājendralāla who thus created a new and immensely potent literary genre.

Rājendralāla's journalistic career began in 1847 or thereabouts, when he became a member of the Tattvabodhinī Sabhā. He was a member of the 'paper committee' of the Tattvabodhinī Patrikā. He assisted Akṣayakumār Datta (1820-86) in editing the celebrated Bengali newspaper to which he contributed articles.

He had a much closer and longer connexion with the famous Hindoo Patriot. In 1862, along with Rājā Pratāpchandra Singh, Ramānāth Tagore and Yatindramohan Tagore, Rājendralāla was nominated one of its trustees. He was a close friend of the Patriot's editor Kristodas Pāl (1838-84). He regularly contributed articles to it. He shouldered the editorial burden for some time after the death of Kristodas Pāl. When he died, the newspaper gratefully recalled its long association with him in an obituary notice dated August 3, 1891. In it, the following was stated about him : "To us personally his loss is irreparable. It is impossible to speak too highly of the valuable contributions for which the Hindoo Patriot is eternally indebted to him. He was a guide and a philosopher, and we do not see any one who is fit to wear his mantle."

A contemporary journal listed his articles, journalistic writings, reviews of Indian works and letters to the editors which had been printed at different times by the Englishman, Indian Daily News, the Statesman, the Phoenix, the Citizen, the Friend of Indian, the Indian Field, the Hindoo Patriot and other newspapers and journals.

Rājendralāla was noted for his devotion to the cause of public welfare. When Calcutta had no municipal government, he was a 'Justice of Peace' by governmental appointment. When the Calcutta Municipality was formed in 1876, he was elected its Commissioner. He acted as a Commissioner for many years by virtue of his victory in consecutive elections for the position. He toiled ceaselessly in the Municipal Board for the good of the citizens of Calcutta.

He was a member of the British Indian Association which was a semi-political organization. His membership of this body commenced from 1856. He took an active part in its proceedings. Later he was elected its Vice-president (1878-80, 1887-88, 1891-92). He also presided over it for three annual terms. (1881-84, 1886-87, 1889-90) "As a Municipal Commissioner", observed the Bengalee, "he was remarkable for his independence, and as a member of the British Indian Association, he was a pillar of strength to that body" (August 1, 1891).

In 1863 according to a provision of the Calcutta University Act, Rājendralāla was elected a Fellow of the University for life. His attendance at the meetings of the Senate was regular, and his help sought for effecting University-sponsored educational reforms was unstinted and substantial. In 1876, he was awarded the degree of 'Doctor of Law' at the annual convocation of the University along with Monier-Williams and Rev. K. M. Banerjee. A marble bust of Rājendralāla was installed in the Senate Hall after his death.

A detailed notice of the organizations with which he was connected would, we are afraid, consume a lot of space. Here, however, we have to state the names of those associations which had once some importance. These were the Bethune Society, Society for the promotion of Industrial Art (of which he was a joint Secretary), Association of Friends for the Promotion of Social Improvement, the photographic Society, and Sāraswat Samāj (over which he Presided). Rājendralāla's activities as a member of these bodies were often very meaningful.

Rājendralāla was also a powerful speaker. There are contemporary reports of his oratorical skill. One of his early speeches was delivered on April 6, 1857 at a meeting in the Town Hall. The speech was politically significant. He said : "Is it just, is it proper, is it right that the Government should allow a whole body of the people to remain above law and the courts which govern the country ? Could anything be more mischievous, more fatal to good government, than such exemption ?" The forthright speech almost became a screaming condemnation of British imperialism when the scholar-orator said : "Devoid of merits which characterize a true Englishman, and possessing all the defects of the Anglo-saxon race, these adventurers from England have carried ruin and devastation to wherever they have gone." The European members of the Photographic Society did not like the speech at all. They fabricated some baseless charges against him, and expelled him from the society.

Rājendralāla's nationalistic spirit and his intense awareness of the drawbacks of the British rule, often voiced powerfully in his speeches, earned for him both plaudits and hostile disregard. He was the President of the Reception Committee of the Second Session of the Indian National Congress which was held at Calcutta. In his address of welcome, he said : "We are all bound by the same political bond, and therefore we constitute one nation. I behold in this Congress the dawn of a better and happier day for India. I look upon it as a quickening of new life. For long, our fathers lived and we have lived as individuals only, or as families, but henceforward, I hope, we shall be living as a nation, united one and all, to promote our welfare and the welfare of our mother country." (Speeches of Rājā Rājendralāla Mitra, 1892, p. 193) The speech clearly proved the great savant's nationalistic fervour, and his desire for national unity.

Rājendralāla's fame did not remain confined within the limits of Bengal. His scholarship was respected in the West, in Europe and America, as well as in India. The British Government of India, too, really could not help recognizing his splendid achievements. It conferred on him three high-sounding titles, i.e. 'Rāibāhādur' (1877), 'Companion of the Indian Empire' or C. I. E. (1878), and 'Rājā' (1888). The Government thus showed its appreciation of the services he had rendered as a scholar and especially as the Director of the Wards' Institution. The Government also sought for his advice in matters pertaining to anti-quarian and literary questions.

Sir Arthur Hobhouse, the then Vice-chancellor of the University of Calcutta, introduced him to the alumni in a manner which does not seem to be unduly exaggerated. He said : "There is no European society of Oriental Scholars to whom he is not honourably known, and there are many who have been glad to admit him as a member and colleague." In fact, Rājendralāla was either a Fellow, or an Honorary Member, of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland, the Italian Institute for the Advancement of Knowledge, the Asiatic Society of Italy, the American Oriental Society, the Bombay branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, the German Oriental Society, the Royal Academy of Science (Hungary), the Ethnological Society of Berlin, and the Royal Society of Northern Antiquities (Copenhagen).

A life-long craving for knowledge brought him honours, glory, and triumph. He died on July 26, 1891, at the age of sixty-nine.

II.

Rājendralāla's Indological writings may be classified into three distinct groups. The first group comprises his writings on Indian architecture, sculpture and socio-political dissertations. His compilations of descriptive catalogues and notices of Sanskrit Manuscripts form the second group. The third group includes his textual studies and the translations of Sanskrit works.

The list of his works, given above, may help the reader have an idea of his tremendous scholarship, and vast Sanskritic knowledge. That he was greatly helped by the native Sanskritists is an undeniable fact. But he always acknowledged his indebtedness to them. Even the title pages of some of his works, such as the Nītisāra or the Elements of Polity and Gopatha Brāhmaṇa of the Atharva Veda, carry a clear mention of the native paṇḍits who had collaborated with him in bringing out the editions. He also mentioned the names of his assistants in the prefaces. His edition of the Taittīriya Brāhmaṇa of the Black Yajur Veda contains on the title-page a statement about the collaboration of several learned paṇḍits, whose names are given in the preface.

In the preface to the Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepāl Rājendralāla mentions the services rendered by Puṇḍit Harināth Vidyāratna, Rāmnāth Tarkaratna and Kāmākṣyānāth Tarkavāgīśa for its composition. In a special note, he expresses his admiration for the English translations by Haraprasād Śāstri. Some people envied his reputation and made a malicious propaganda against him. They said that Rājendralāla shone in borrowed glory. The propaganda against him was based on a lie, which was calculated to harm his reputation. Rājendralāla's Sanskritic erudition is really indubitable.

His works, of course, had some defects and lacunae. According to Dr. S. K. De "It appears that the Pandits, with whose assistance these works were prepared were not well-versed in the various subjects included in their scope." (Bengali Literature in the Nineteenth Century, 1962, p. 629) Some of his works, especially his editions of Sanskrit texts, have been superseded by later critical editions. The accelerating pace of development and research, and the march of time make this inevitable. But should we forget that he was a great scholar whose works were the fruits of much honest labour? Should we fail to see that the pioneer blazed a trail and scarcely followed a beaten track? Should it ever be denied that his works formed the magnificent foundations of further investigations into, and critical studies of, the vast Sanskrit lore?

Rājendralāla was the first Indian Indologist of the nineteenth century who consecrated his life to the search for and discovery of a vast treasure-trove of antiquities. His textual criticism showed his adherence to the prevalent western methods of editio princeps. It was replete with the evidence of his mastery of Sanskrit-Buddhist language and literature. The novelty of his method of studying old texts has not yet fully outlived its usefulness. His method has been followed by successive generations of Indian scholars. As early as in 1868, when most of the books by Rājendralāla were yet to be published, Max Müller wrote the following eulogy on his merits: "Bābu Rājendralāla reads Sanskrit of course, with the greatest ease. He is a pandit by profession, but he is at the same time a scholar and critic in our sense of the word. He has edited Sanskrit texts after a careful collation of MSS., and in his various contributions to the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal he has proved himself completely above the prejudices of his class, freed from the erroneous views on the history and literature of India in which every Brahman is brought up, and thoroughly imbued with those principles of criticism which men like Colebrooke, Lassen and Burnouf have followed in their researches into the literary treasures of his country. His English is remarkably clear and simple, and his arguments would do credit to any Sanskrit scholar in England." (Chips from a German Workshop, Vol. I, 1868, p. 300)

The Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepāl was written by Rājendralāla in his later years. A product of great labour, it shows the author's acute insight. It is as yet indispensable. The facts about the manuscripts, the modes and methods followed in editing and translating them are all narrated in the book's introduction. B.H. Hodgson (1800-94) once collected an enormous mass of Sanskrit Buddhist texts in Nepal. He had distributed the manuscripts among six famous libraries. "The collection in the Bengal Asiatic Society," observed Sir W. W. Hunter, "supplied the materials for Dr. Rājendralāla Mitra's monumental work on the Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepal—perhaps the highest achievement of Hindu scholarship in this century." (Life of Brian Houghton Hodgson, 1896, p. 267) Ever since the time of its first publication, the book has been extensively used as a book of sources and materials in India, Europe and America.

Bengali Literature particularly owes much to it. Rabindranāth Tagore lured from it useable raw-materials for a number of poems and plays. The poet's letters and biographies tell us how much he liked to have some selected books while travelling, or journeying by boat on the broad expanse of the river Padmā. The Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepāl, of which the poet was very fond, was invariably carried by him in his travels. (cf. Chinnapatra, letter No. 74 dated March, 1893) That for at least eight poems of Kathā (1900) the source-materials have been gleaned from Rājendra-lāla's book is mentioned in the introductory notices of the poetical collection. The poet has made certain modifications of the original source; but these are slight and, therefore, justified by poetic law. In Kathā we find that the story elements of the following poems are taken from The Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepāl: 'Śreṣṭha Vikṣa' (Avadāna Śataka, No. 55, p. 33), 'Pūjārini' (Avadāna Śataka, No. 54, p. 33), 'Mūlya Prāpti' (Avadāna Śataka, No. 6, p. 20), 'Mastaka Vikraya', (Mahāvastu Avadāna, pp. 153-4), 'Parīsoḍh' (Mahāvastu Avadāna, p. 131), 'Avisār' (Bōdhisattvāvadāna Kalpalatā, No. 72, p. 66), 'Sāmānya Kṣhati' (Divyāvadānamālā, No. 10, p. 311), 'Nagar Lakṣmī' (Kalpadrūmāvadāna, No. 16, p. 296-7). The poems 'Pūjārini' and 'Parīsoḍh' were later transformed into two dance-dramas, Naṭir pūjā (1926) and Śyāmā (1939) respectively. Tagore's Princess Mālinī is a character from Mahāvastu Avadāna (p. 118); he makes her a heroine of his play titled Mālinī (1896). The sources of Rājā (1910), Arūpratan (1920) and Śāpmochan (1931) may also be traced to Mahāvastu Avadāna (pp. 138-41) and Kuśa Jātaka (p. 108). Some of the characters of Achalāyatana (1911) are adapted from Pañchaka Avadāna (pp. 309-12). The Buddhist 'Mantras' used in the play are also to be found in the Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepāl. Tagore writes in the prefatory notes on Chandālikā (1933) that he had got the story from Sārdūlakarṇa Avadāna (p. 219).

Some other Bengali poets, too, adapted stories from Rājendra-lāla's book.

About sixty years ago a young Englishman, placed by the exigencies of public service amidst strangers in an inhospitable and till then little-known clime, occupied himself in collecting materials, which have since afforded the key to the religion of one-fifth of the human race. That Englishman was Brian Houghton Hodgson, and a brief notice of his career in India may not be out of place here.

Born at the close of the last century, he entered the Bengal Civil Service as a writer on April 30, 1818. According to the rules of the Service at the time, he had, on his arrival at Calcutta, on August following, to attend for a year the College of Fort William, and pass through the usual course of training there. His career at the College was a highly satisfactory one, and he distinguished himself greatly by his zeal, assiduity and successful study of the Persian language. On August 20, 1819, he was appointed Assistant to the Commissioner of Kumaon, which office he exchanged, on the following year, for that of Assistant to the Resident of Kathmandu. His services in these two offices were well-spoken of, and in two years (November 23, 1822) he was promoted to the Foreign Office, as Officiating Deputy Secretary in the Persian Department. At the beginning of 1824 he returned to Kathmandu to assume charge of the Post Office there; but he did not hold it long. In March 1825, he reverted to his former office of Assistant to the Resident, which he held till he was himself appointed Resident in January 1833. His career as a Resident extended from that time to the close of 1843, when he retired from the Service. His sojourn in Nepal thus extended over a period of twenty-one years. In 1848, he returned to India, and lived for nine years at Darjiling as a private resident, engaged in literary and scientific pursuits.

Gifted with intellectual powers of the highest order, thoroughly well educated, and possessing indomitable energy, Mr. Hodgson was always most laudably employed, and the result of his labours placed him in the foremost rank as an accomplished man of letters and a highly successful cultivator of science in India.

Of his services to Government no notice need be taken here. Suffice it to say that he repeatedly received cordial thanks for them, and all along enjoyed the fullest confidence of his employers. To him is especially due the credit of frustrating, at a very critical period, the intrigues which were being carried on for the overthrow of English supremacy in India by the Sikhs, the Sindhians, and the Marhattas during the first Afghan war when the country was denuded of British troops. During the years 1838 to 1842 he was instrumental in intercepting twenty-three missions from Kathmandu to the plains, and in holding back the Nepal Durbar from avenging the defeat it had sustained in 1816. His wisdom, tact, influence, and judicious management also contributed largely to secure for the British Government the cooperation of Nepalese soldiers during the Mutiny of 1857-58.

His literary labours may be noticed under two heads : first, what were undertaken for Government ; second, what were rendered to the republic of letters. Under the first head come the various memoirs and reports which he submitted to Government in his official capacity. The ordinary round of duties devolving on an Assistant in an Indian embassy is limited enough ; but an officer in a foreign Court has many opportunities of collecting and digesting valuable information, and Mr. Hodgson utilised them to the utmost. While working as Assistant to the Resident, his attention was first directed to the military organisation of Nepal, and his studies resulted in two memoirs giving details regarding the then existing force of the Nepal Durbar, the military tribes and races from which it was drawn, their tribal names and classification, their physical and moral qualities as soldiers, their pay and discipline, as also the manufacture of their arms and ammunitions. He closed his memoirs with the suggestion that the British Government should obtain through the Durbar the services of a large body of the Gurkha soldiery, so as, on the one hand, to reduce the chances of collision with Nepal, and, on the other, to remove the homogeneity of the Bengal army. The memoirs were very favourably received, and elicited the hearty thanks of Government ; but the suggestion was not acted upon until many years after.

Mr. Hodgson next turned his attention to the commerce of Nepal with the people of the plains on this side, and with those of Central Asia and China on the other. For some time before the first Nepal war this commerce was extensive, and Mr. Hodgson's object, in the papers he wrote on the subject, was to furnish practical directions, routes and details about travelling, and custom house charges, with a view to revive that commerce, and divert the people from their warlike propensities. The topographical and statistical information compiled in those papers was of high importance, comprising as they did translations of some old itineraries from Kathmandu to Darjiling, and of all principal military routes in the valley of Nepal.

The legal administration of the country also found in him an able and most faithful historiographer. The administration was purely Hindu, absolutely untouched by foreign influence for several centuries, and in it he very justly recognised the outcome of ancient Indian Brahmanic laws developed by Indian administrators. His essay on this subject appeared in the Researches of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, and for the first time gave to Europeans a faithful and complete picture of the social condition of the people of Nepal. The opinion of the Bengal Government on this report was thus expressed.—“This subject is one which possesses much interest, whether for the legislator, the historian, or the philosopher. In Hindustan we look in vain for any traces of Hindu legislation or government. The Moslem conquerors have everywhere swept them away. And if we wish to enquire what are the features of the Hindu system of Jurisprudence and Judicature it is in Nepal we must seek for the answer. Mr. Hodgson is the first who has enabled us to obtain a precise and definitive view of the subject. His information was transmitted to the Governor-General, and the Governor-General deemed it of sufficient importance to authorise its publication.”

During his sojourn in Nepal Mr. Hodgson was greatly impressed by the evils which resulted from the borders of the Nepal territory, serving as an Alsatia to the criminal classes of India. The weakly governed dominion of the king of Oudh was a rich field of adventure for men of this class, and when hard-pressed they always found a secure asylum in those borders. Nor were their operations confined to Oudh. Well-organised parties sallied forth from the Terai every year, and committed depredations over the whole of India, as far as Dakkhan, returning from their expeditions, heavily laden with booty, during the rains when Thuggi and highway robbery were the least productive. Before devising means for the suppression of the evil, Mr. Hodgson deemed it expedient to collect information from the robbers themselves and others familiar with the subject, and compiled a large mass of authentic depositions and facts for which he received the most cordial acknowledgments of Government. They ultimately, but after some delay, led to the establishment of the Thuggi Department, which has completely broken up the organized bands of robbers which had been for a long time the opprobrium of every civilized Government in India.

The next subject to which reference should be made is Indian Education. The battle fought between the Anglicists and the Orientalists during the administration of Lord William Bentinck, was of too stirring a character to escape the notice of Mr. Hodgson. Remarkable alike for the force and massiveness of his intellect and for his disinterestedness and devotion to the well-being of the people of this country, he plunged into it with characteristic intrepidity. But he joined neither the Anglicists led by Lord William Bentinck, Mr. Macaulay, Mr. Trevelyan and Dr. Duff, nor the Orientalists who were represented by Dr. Wilson, Dr. Tytler, Mr. Thoby Prinsep and Mr. John Colvin. He could not for a moment believe that the English language could under any circumstance be made the vernacular of the two hundred and forty millions of India, and he cherished equal doubts about the fitness of the Sanskrit and the Arabic languages for the every-day use of the various nationalities and races who inhabit this vast country. He adopted, therefore, a middle course. Without detracting from the merits of the English language and of the ancient classics as instruments of intellectual culture for the select few, he held that education to be effectual for the masses must be imparted through the medium of the current vernaculars. In Europe vernacular languages had achieved wonderful success. They had dispelled the impervious gloom of the Middle Ages, and inaugurated an era of widespread intellectual enlightenment, the like of which the world had never before seen ; and he urged that, under similar circumstances, the vernaculars of India were well able to accomplish the same object. This via media, however, did not commend itself to men's minds at the time. People in power then were so wedded to their extreme opinions that they could not listen to what appeared to them to be a mere compromise, and the admirable letters in which Mr. Hodgson put forth his views in the columns of the local newspapers and afterwards published in book-form were to a great extent neglected by them. But the letters did not fail to attract the attention of persons who had not fallen in with the theories of the two contending parties, and the testimony borne by these regarding the soundness of his arguments, must have been a source of great satisfaction to the learned author. In a letter to the Political Agent at Bhopal, in 1838, the late Dr. John Wilson, of Bombay, than whom few could speak with greater emphasis on questions relating to Indian education, remarked : "Mr. Hodgson's advocacy of the vernaculars is most powerful and convincing. They must be the medium of the regeneration of India, as they have been such of every country on the face of the globe." In the same year the official Report on Education in Bengal (p. 200) contained the following : "No one has more earnestly urged the duty of communicating European knowledge to the natives than Mr. Hodgson ; no one has more powerfully shown the importance of employing the vernacular languages for accomplishing that object ; no one has more eloquently illustrated the necessity of conciliating the learned and making them our coadjutors in the great work of a nation's regeneration." Five years after, in his address to the Medical College of Calcutta, Professor Sir William O'Shaughnessy said : "The progress of the principles of Normal and Vernacular Education cannot now be checked. These facts (see his address to the Medical College students) have deprived the anti-vernacular party of even a pretext for advocating the exclusive use either of English or of the learned native tongues. Let those who wish well to India, and desire to see its inhabitants flourish in knowledge, visit the secondary schools of the new Medical College, and they will see the first fruits of the Normal system. I have felt it an imperative duty to publish these important facts. It is the only contribution I can offer to the measures of the eminent and wise philanthropist under whose auspices normal instruction is now claiming public support." Truth once put forth can never be lost, and it is gratifying to notice that for the last thirty years Mr. Hodgson's opinion has been very widely accepted, and much has already been done in India to accord to the vernaculars their right place in the curriculum of education.

The next question of local value to which Mr. Hodgson addressed himself was the fitness of the Himalaya mountains for the settlement of Europeans. He had watched with lively interest the introduction of tea-planting at Darjiling, and knowing how intimately that industry was connected with that of European colonization in this country, he came to the conclusion that, though the plains would not, and could not, be inhabited permanently by Englishmen, no objection would apply to the hills, and if adequate and remunerative occupations could be found for them there, the problem would at once be solved. The then Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal was struck by this opinion, and desired Mr. Hodgson to furnish him with a memorandum thereon. The report furnished pleased him much, and "he ordered its publication along with some of the author's previous Essays to make up an entire number of the Selections from the Records. No. XXVII was the result, whereby most of the aforementioned papers, though in themselves hardly official, became so by adoption."

The papers above noticed form but a small fraction of the writings of Mr. Hodgson. A keen observer, master of a facile pen, and enthusiastically devoted to study, he neglected no opportunity of taking notes of all that appeared before him, 'whether performed by man or produced by nature' ; and his writings are as varied as they are voluminous, bearing the most satisfactory evidence of his ardent zeal, unremitting industry, and profound learning. Man formed the central figure of his study, and he devoted a great part of his time to researches into the elucidation of the ethnic relations, the languages, the ancient history, the literatures, and the handicrafts of the different tribes of men who fell under his observation. His ethnological papers* include all the different and till then almost unknown tribes of the Eastern Himalayas to the Indo-Chinese borders, and several of Central and Southern India as far as Ceylon, and the information collected have been pronounced by competent judges to be of high scientific value. Speaking of one of them—the little volume on the Kooch, Bodo and Dhimal tribes,—Dr. Latham writes : “The Kooch, Bodo and Dhimal, is the title of one of Mr. Hodgson’s works, and it is a model of an ethnological monograph.” Speaking more generally, he says, “Next come in brilliant succession the labours of Botta, Layard, and Rawlinson, to which may be added the bold yet cautious criticism and varied observations of Hodgson, illustrating the obscure Ethnology of the Himalayan Indians.” Chevalier Bunsen, in his Philosophy of Universal History, is equally emphatic in his estimate of Mr. Hodgson’s works. According to him, “our highest living authority and best informant on the Ethnology of the native races of India is Mr. B. H. Hodgson, who uses Tamilian as the general name of the Non-Aryan races.”

Dr. Hooker dedicated his Rhododendrons of Himalaya to Mr. Hodgson, “whose researches into the physical geography and especially the ethnology of the people of the Eastern Himalaya,” he said, “are beyond all praise.” Professor Owen, in his report to the British Association, May 1863, bore the following testimony on the subject : “Mr. Hodgson, my accomplished and scientific friend, has contributed an important element to the Ancient History of India, by his Buddhist researches, and he has now established an additional claim to the gratitude of the Ethnologist, by the collection he has made of the skulls of various tribes.” Dr. Barnard Davis, on the same occasion, said : “Mr. Hodgson early and constantly felt that the most interesting object of natural history is man himself, and he devoted his unremitting attention to the study of the many curious tribes with whom his long residence in India brought him in contact. He studied the physical and philological aspects of the subject, and was at infinite pains to gain a knowledge of the ideas as well as languages of these races. One of the most complete Ethnological Essays ever written, is Mr. Hodgson’s book on Kooch, Bodo and Dhimal Tribes. Other authorities, equally distinguished, have spoken in similar terms of Mr. Hodgson’s ethnological works, but I shall forbear to quote them.

Mr. Hodgson’s researches into religion are limited to that form of it which prevails in Nepal—the Buddhism of Śākya Siṃha as it manifested itself in that Alpine region on its expulsion from Hindustan,—but he has done more on that subject than any other European writer.* Before his time all that was known of Buddhism was crude, vague and shadowy, derived from secondary and by no means reliable sources. He it was who established the subject on a sound philosophical basis. To quote the language of M. Csoma de Körös, than whom no European had studied the literature of Tibetan Buddhism with greater success, "Mr. Hodgson's illustrations of the literature and religion of the Buddhists form a wonderful combination of knowledge on a new subject with the deepest philosophical speculations." The opinion of the illustrious savant, Eugène Burnouf, in regard to one of Mr. Hodgson's papers is equally emphatic. In his Introduction to the History of Buddhism, he says, "In the Asiatic Researches for the year 1828 was contained a dissertation by Mr. Hodgson, full of ideas entirely new regarding the languages, literature, and religion of Nepal and of Tibet ; and this first essay contained also an account of the different philosophical schools of Buddhism, which has never since been surpassed or equalled. This first memoir yet further teemed with value as bringing to light, among other important discoveries, the grand and theretofore wholly unknown fact that in Nepal there existed numerous Buddhist works composed in Sanskrit, the original language of Buddhism." Altogether he has written 18 papers on the subject, and they are replete with most varied and instructive information. Much has been done since, but no one can even now write on Buddhism with any accuracy who has not thoroughly studied Mr. Hodgson's essays.

No one can live on the Himalayas without being deeply impressed by the sublime scenery around him, and to students of science it affords the richest field for enquiry and research. The lofty snow-capped peaks, the wonderful glaciers, the intricate river systems, the high tablelands, the fertile valleys, the flora and the fauna, so peculiar, so characteristic, so distinct from everything of the kind seen in other parts of the globe, are all fraught with instruction of the deepest interest to science, and Mr. Hodgson devoted himself to their study with the greatest ardour. Few were at the time better qualified by previous training, habit of research, and scientific acumen to do them adequate justice, and the various essays and notes he has published on the Physical Geography, Topography† and Fauna prove the success with which he prosecuted his researches. Adverting to the essay on the Physical Geography of the Himalaya Mountains and Tibet, Baron Humboldt remarked, "La chaîne de l'Himalaya a eu dans ces derniers temps des savants observateurs, M. Studying Mr. Hodgson's statements and map, proving the identity of the Sampu and the Brahmaputra rivers, the great Indian geographer, Pemberton, remarked, "I consider this so satisfactory that nothing but ocular demonstration to the contrary could now shake off my conviction."

The fruits of his zoological researches are contained in a series of one hundred and thirty papers,* alike remarkable for great originality, minute observation, keen acumen, high critical skill, and thorough knowledge of the requirements of scientific classification. completed a natural history of the quadrupeds and birds of these regions. Throughout the Bird and Quadruped departments of our national Museum, Mr. Hodgson's name stands prominent." Dr. Jerdon says, "Mr. Hodgson, for many years our accomplished Minister at the Court of Nepal, has added largely to our knowledge of the birds of the Himalaya, few of which escaped his notice. His papers are distinguished by deep research and great acumen, and are very full of details of structure."

The following extract from the Natural History Review for April 1865, p. 156, is also worthy of notice :

" About the year 1832, Mr. B. H. Hodgson, for many years British resident at the Court of Nepal, began his labours. This gentleman, it may be fairly said, has distinguished himself far beyond all his fellow-workers, by the great extent of his collections, and the numerous observations he has given to the public on almost every branch of Natural Science. Before Mr. Hodgson commenced his residence in Nepal, the Zoology of that country and of the high ranges of the great adjacent mountain-chain was almost unknown in Europe, and the novelties, which it fell to his lot to discover and describe, were consequently both striking and numerous. With the utmost liberality Mr. Hodgson has from time to time presented the whole of his enormous collections to the British Museum, and to other scientific institutions in this country, and though it is much to be regretted that he has never collected the whole of his scattered writings into one connected series, this deficiency has been to some extent supplied by two catalogues of Mr. Hodgson's collections, published by the Trustees of the British Museum in 1846 and 1863. Referring to the list of Birds in the second edition of this catalogue (prepared, we believe, by Mr. G. R. Gray,) it will be seen that the species of this class of Vertebrates obtained by Mr. Hodgson, in Nepal, Sikim, and Tibet number no less than 168. Nearly the whole of these are represented in our National Collection, through Mr. Hodgson's munificence, by several specimens in skins as well as by drawings made from life, and in many instances by skeletons or portions of skeletons."

The time, trouble, and expense incurred in collecting materials for the above contributions were immense. Hunters, taxidermists, collectors, draftsmen, copyists, and translators had to be organised and trained, their works constantly watched and directed, and their charges all defrayed from a private purse; and, amidst his onerous official duties and private literary occupation, Mr. Hodgson cheerfully did all that was necessary or desirable. Of the work done by his staff of hunters and taxidermists, some idea may be formed from the fact that no less than a total of 10,499 specimens, including 9,512 birds, 903 mammals, and 84 reptiles &c., all their handiwork, were presented to the British Museum, besides several thousands more to the Asiatic Society of Bengal and other scientific bodies. Duplicates from these collections have been distributed to the chief European and American Societies.

The draftsmen were employed in drawing natural history specimens and ethnological, architectural and antiquarian subjects, as also maps, plans, routes &c. The drawings were made of one uniform size, folio, each containing one or more subjects. There is no record to show the total number of drawings prepared under the superintendence and at the expense of Mr. Hodgson; but he presented 1,241 sheets containing drawings of birds and 567 sheets of mammals to the Zoological Society of London; 55 sheets of reptiles &c. to the British Museum; 46 sheets of ethnological illustrations to the Christie Collection; 61 sheets of ditto to the Anthropological Society of London; 66 sheets of architectural drawings to the India Office Library; and 24 sheets of architectural and 258 sheets of archæological drawings to the Institute of France. The last were accompanied by a large mass of MSS., mostly in Sanskrit, explanatory of the Buddhist drawings. It is to these that M. Burnouf repeatedly refers in his great work on the History of Indian Buddhism.

Mr. Hodgson's collection comprised a great number of ethnographical specimens, mostly crania, which have been given to the British Museum. It included, moreover, three trunks full of MSS. of various kinds, in Sanskrit, Newārī, Persian, and English (mostly unpublished essays, papers and notes by Mr. Hodgson, and translations from old Indian records), which had been amassed for the full exposition of the history, institutions, races and tongues, revenue and commerce of Nepal and other Indian places. The whole of this collection was presented to the India Office, in August 1864, along with a detailed catalogue of its contents. The catalogue is too long to be copied here, but the following extract from the report of the Librarian of the India Office will give an idea of the value attached to the collection by a competent judge.

“Mr. Hodgson’s present to our Library is indeed one of eminent importance, if only embracing materials from which, for the first time, the history, political, religious and linguistic, of Nepal might be digested by a competent scholar. That a person duly qualified to undertake such a compilation be found is highly desirable ; though no one in any wise so ably as the learned donor himself could execute an account of a people, among whom, in the advantageous and responsible position of British Resident at the Court of Kathmandu, Mr. Hodgson passed nearly a quarter of a century. At least it is earnestly to be hoped that Mr. Hodgson’s health will still render it practicable for him to contribute a single chapter, and that a most valuable one, to the history of Nepal, in a narrative of the measures by which he succeeded, on more than one critical occasion, in restraining the Nepalese from disastrous irruption into the plains of India. The influence that effectuated this check, was wholly personal to Mr. Hodgson, and yet the service here referred to, though of momentous import, has never, it occurs to me, been recognised.

“The Sanskrit and other oriental MSS. sent by Mr. Hodgson are a priceless addition to our collection. Of most of these there are no other copies in Europe.”

Among the papers contained in this collection was a number of vocabularies of the non-Aryan vernaculars of India and its frontiers, and these have been most satisfactorily utilised in Dr. W. W. Hunter’s Non-Aryan Dictionary.

There are yet two other contributions made by Mr. Hodgson to the cause of knowledge which require to be noticed here. The first is a collection of zylographs, comprising two complete sets of the great cyclopedias of Tibet, the Kahgyur and the Stangyur. Each set is made up of 334 bulky volumes, printed with wooden blocks on Tibetan paper, in the Indian puthi form, and comprises the whole circle of the sacred literature of the Tibetans. Analyses of these grand compilations have been published by M. Csoma de Körös in the last volume of the Asiatic Researches and in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, and they show the high value of the works for a correct understanding of the religion of Buddha as current beyond the Himalayan range. The number of copies extant of these grand compilations is exceedingly limited. The Kahgyur alias Kangyur includes no less than a hundred volumes, arranged under the three grand divisions of Dulva, Do, and Sherchin, whence their common name De-not-sum, Sanskrit, Tripithaka, "The three Repositories." This is obviously of the same character as the Buddhist Tripithaka as now known in China and Japan, of which Rev. S. Beal has lately published a useful catalogue, though the order of arrangement and the contents are not the same. The whole of the works in either case is strictly sacred or religious. The name Kahgyur means "translations of commandments," and the works are avowed to be translations of texts existing between the 7th and the 13th centuries, mostly in the 9th, in the language of Magadha.

"The Stangyur is a compilation in Tibetan of all sorts of literary works, written, mostly by ancient Indian Paṇḍits, and some learned Tibetans, in the first centuries after the introduction of Buddhism into Tibet, commencing with the seventh century of our era. The whole makes two hundred and twenty-five volumes. It is divided into two classes the རྒྱུད་ and མདོ་ Rgyud and Mdo, (Tantra and Sūtra classes in Sanskrit). The 'Rgyud,' mostly on Tāntrika rituals and ceremonies, makes eighty-seven volumes. The 'Mdo,' on science and literature, occupies one hundred and thirty-six volumes. One separate volume contains hymns or praises of several deities or saints. And one volume is the Index of the whole." (Asiatic Researches, XXI, 553.) Only a few of the richer monasteries of Tibet possess these zylographs : beyond Tibet they are unknown. The works were first printed in 1731, from blocks which are still in use in a monastery near Testrilhua-po. Mr. Hodgson obtained two sets, the second set, now in the India Office, from the Grand Lama of Tibet. The first set is now preserved in the Library of the Asiatic Society of Bengal.

The second contribution refers to Sanskrit-Buddhist works, of which Mr. Hodgson discovered a great number in Nepal. The existence of these was before his time perfectly unknown, and his discovery has entirely revolutionized the history of Buddhism as it was known to Europeans in the early part of this century. The total number of works discovered is not known, but it is believed that the works when carefully arranged and indexed will amount to about two hundred. Copies of these works to the total number of 381 bundles have been distributed so as to render them accessible to European scholars. Of these eighty-six bundles comprising 179 separate works were presented to the Asiatic Society of Bengal ; 85 to the Royal Asiatic Society of London ; 30 to the India Office Library ; 7 to the Bodleian Library, Oxford ; 174 to the Societe Asiatique, and M. Burnouf. The last two collections have since been deposited in the Bibliotheque Nationale of France.

The character of these works was first noticed by Mr. Hodgson in his Essays. He was thus not only the discoverer of these most ancient and authentic records, but also the first intelligent exponent of their nature and value, both in their ritualistic and in their philosophical aspect, and very appropriately did Burnouf address him, in the dedication of his Saddharma-puṇḍarīka, “comme fondateur de la véritable etude de Buddhisme.” Elsewhere he added, “Quand aux dogmas generaux de Buddhisme il n’y a rien dans le Saddharma-puṇḍarīka que ne se trouve dans vos excellents memoires. Vous avez tracé d’une maniere complète et-hardie le plan de l’edifice de Buddhisme.” It should be added, however, that the plan adopted by Mr. Hodgson was to give the result of his researches, and not to describe at length the contents of the works found by him, and his notices, therefore, served more to excite than to allay curiosity in regard to those texts.

M. Burnouf, working on the codices that were sent to France, produced, in 1844, his Introduction a l’Histoire du Buddhisme indien. None can speak too highly of the industry, the ability, and the critical acumen displayed in this learned essay ; but in it the nature of the materials was subordinated to the historical facts deducible from them, and the MSS. therefore remained comparatively unknown. His next venture was a translation of one of the works, the Saddharma-puṇḍarīka—le Lotus de la bonne Loi—and it affords an excellent specimen of the nature, character, style, and subject of the Nepalese collection.

The MSS. presented to the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain have the benefit of a nominal catalogue prepared by Professors Cowell and Egging, but no analysis of any of them has yet been published. Mr. Bendall has, I hear, in hand an edition of the Vinaya-Sūtra, and M. E. Senart promises a recension of the Mahāvastu Avadāna, taken probably from the Paris collection.

Of the Calcutta collection one work, the Lalita-Vistara, was published by me several years ago, and brief notices were added of seven others in its Introduction ; but the rest, until lately, had never been touched. Even the list preserved of it was corrupt, sometimes describing the same work under two or three names as different works, at others giving one name for four or five or more works. These mistakes arose chiefly from the fact of two or more different works having been written continuously in a single volume without any break in the pagination, and in cursory examination, only the first and the last page of each codex having been read to make out the name of the volume.

In order to bring to a focus all the information available regarding the MSS. brought away from Nepal by Mr. Hodgson, Dr. W. W. Hunter published, last year, a catalogue, giving the names of all the works comprised in the several collections ; but the list given in it of the Calcutta collection, compiled by me from the records of the Asiatic Society's office, is, I am sorry to observe, for the reasons aforesaid, not correct. Whether similar errors, owing to similar causes, exist in the European lists or not, I cannot make out ; but on the whole the Catalogue is a useful compilation, and the thanks of oriental scholars are due to its learned author for the service he has done them by its publication.

When the MSS. were discovered, opinion was divided as to their age and authenticity. While men like Burnouf, Prinsep, Wilson and others accepted them to represent the oldest records of Buddhism, those who had directed their attention to the Pāli texts of Southern Buddhism thought otherwise ; and the discovery and decipherment of the Aśoka edicts strengthened their position a great deal. It was urged that since the Pāli of the edicts was the oldest type of that language, and it was unquestionably the vernacular of India within 250 years of Buddha's ministry, and since it was equally unquestionable that Buddha sought proselytes among the unlettered classes of society, he must have addressed them in the vernacular dialect of the time, and the most authentic and ancient record of his religion necessarily must be found in the Pāli language. This, however, is a non sequitor. Admitting, for the sake of argument and not as facts, that the premises are correct, it does not follow that the religion of Śākya Siṃha must exist in the Pāli language. The language used in preaching to the masses is not the language that is ordinarily used, nor is it fit, for the development of abstruse philosophical ideas ; and the southern Pāli texts do not pretend that they are verbatim reports of Śākya's preachings. It would be absurd to suppose that in the 6th century before Christ there was any organisation for verbatim reports, and that such organisation was brought into operation to take down the sermons and lectures of an itinerant hermit addressed to the lower orders of the people. It must follow that the teachings of the saint were recorded by his followers, long after date, when the effect of those teachings had been thoroughly established, and there was a desire created to know what he had taught ; and that the records contained the substance of the teachings as remembered by those who reduced them to writing. In such a case it is by no means necessary that even the language should be the same which was used at the time of preaching. To quote the opinion of Mr. Hodgson (Essays, p. 121) : "The preaching and the spreading of the religion is a very different thing from the elaboration of those speculative principles from which the religion was deduced. In the one case, the appeal would be to the many ; in the other to the few. And whilst I am satisfied that the Buddhists as practical reformers addressed themselves to the people, and as propagandists used the vulgar tongue, I think those philosophical dogmata which formed the basis of the popular creed, were enounced, defended, and systematised in Sanskrit. I never alleged that the Buddhists had eschewed the Prākritis, I only denied the allegation that they had eschewed the Sanskrit ; and I endeavoured at the same time, to reconcile their use of both, by drawing a distinction between the means employed by their philosophers to establish the principles of their religion, and the means employed by their missionaries to propagate the religion itself." History fully supports the validity of this position ; but not to travel out of India I may appeal to a parallel case of recent date and unquestionable authenticity—that of Chaitanya of the 15th century—to prove the fact. The lectures of that saint were delivered in three languages : Bengali in Bengal, Uriah in Orissa, and Hindi in the North Western Provinces, but they have been all reduced to Bengali in the Chaitanya-charitmārta, while his philosophical doctrines occur in Sanskrit. So strong was the influence of Sanskrit in this case that the followers of the saint have thought fit even to annex to the Bengali text a Sanskrit commentary. In the 6th century before Christ, this influence of the Brāhmaṇic language must have been infinitely more powerful, and it is difficult to suppose that its use was then avoided even in philosophical disquisitions. Were it otherwise, still the fact is patent that the Buddhists themselves, both Northern and Southern, admit in the most unqualified terms that their scriptures, including the teachings of the founder, were compiled, not during the lifetime of the teacher, but at three convocations held from time to time during 250 years after his death. This admission is a settler. To contradict it would be to attach to a priori arguments an importance which logically they cannot claim.

Nor are the premises on which the theory is based at all tenable. The Pāli of the Edicts was, doubtless, the language of record and the Court language of Aśoka ; it was probably also, with more or less local variations, the vernacular of the Indo-Aryan races ; but it is far from being a proved fact, that it was the common vernacular of all the different races, Aryan and non-Aryan, who peopled India in former times. Nay, the presumption is strong that the case was quite the contrary. Unity of language implies or presupposes not only unity of race, unity of religion, and unity of political condition, but also unity of climatic influences. Sounds are the outcome of the vocal organs ; but those organs, though formed on the same model and structurally are identically the same, are not in the same state of development and tension under all circumstances. The gutturals of northern climes, which we have to "hiss, spit and sputter all," cannot be naturalised in the tropics. The guttural K of the Persians is entirely lost by their descendants in India, even in the second generation. The early Indo-Aryans had the same K, as we find in the Prātiśākhya, but it has long since been lost. The Bengali organs of speech in the Gangetic delta cannot control the sounds which are natural to the people of Central and North West India. Hence it is that among the descendants of the Aryan immigrants one single language, the original Sanskrit, got converted into the different vernaculars that are now current. The process of change was even more powerfully in operation at the time of Aśoka, when social intercourse among the different tribes was more limited than it is now. Then, at that time, the non-Aryan races were more powerful and better organized than now, and they spoke in very different dialects. And under the circumstances it was impossible for the Pāli to have been the common vernacular of all at the time of Aśoka. It might have been the lingua franca, but certainly not the vernacular or the household language of all classes.

Three hundred years before the time of Aśoka the case was even stronger. Society was much more divided, the different tribes were more isolated, and the influences which regulate the decay and regeneration of languages much more actively in operation ; and it was impossible for Śākya Buddha to make himself intelligible to his mixed Aryan and non-Aryan audiences in one common language. He must have adapted his language to the capacity of his hearers, and if we had verbatim reports of his lectures, they would have shown that he did not speak in the same dialect at Magadha and at Srāvastī. There is then the evidence of the Gāthā, which has been so largely quoted in Buddhist works to prove the authenticity of the Sanskrit narratives, to show that the popular language of the Aryans at the time of Aśoka's death and for some time before it, was the Gāthā and not the Pāli. (Cf. Introduction to my edition of the Lalita-Vistara) And this suggests the question—was it the Gāthā, or some now unknown archaic form of Pāli, or the Gāthā in varying forms to suit local circumstances, that Śākya used in his preachings? There is nothing reliable to answer this question; but whatever it was, it was not pure Sanskrit, nor was it the same everywhere. A preacher anxious to win the heart of his hearers and secure proselytes could not adopt any language but that which would appeal directly and tellingly to the hearers. The Sanskrit could not do so in the time of Śākya Siṅha, ergo the language of Śākya was not Sanskrit, but one or more vernaculars, and the same must have been the case with his successors. Anyhow with the unquestionable and living proof of the Gāthā, we cannot unhesitatingly accept the Pāli.

Professor Lassen, following Turnour and the Ceylonese accounts, is of opinion that Mahendra arrived in Ceylon in 245 B. C., and he or his successors taught the religion of Śākya orally, without any text, for one hundred and fifty years, until between 102 and 75 B. C. the Pitakataya was committed to writing in Pāli and its commentaries in Cingalese (Mahavanso, Ch. 33), and five hundred years after that Buddhaghosa translated the latter into Pāli. (Idem, Ch. 37.) Dr. John Muir does not subscribe to this opinion. He says, "It is also difficult to concur in Lassen's opinion as to the period at which the Pāli or Māgadhi was introduced into Ceylon. Mahendra and his followers who were no doubt numerous, must necessarily have carried with them the language of their native country; and not only so, but they may have been the bearers of numerous works written in that language. For it is not easy to receive literally the account given by the Ceylonese writers of the time, at which their religious works were first committed to writing, or to suppose that the foreign propagators of Buddhism, who would at first be ignorant of Cingalese, should, at the period of their arrival, have had no records in their own language of the new religion which they were introducing, or that these records should not have been safely handed down to their successors." While fully subscribing to Dr. Muir's argument, I cannot help thinking that the expressions, "the language of their native country" and "records in their own language," are calculated to mislead. The language of the records must have been that in which they were preserved in their native country, and not necessarily their native vernacular. In case of the Jesuit Missionaries in Southern India, the language of the Bible they introduced was not the vernacular of their native country; and what was true of the Missionaries was equally so of the Buddhist propagandists. At the time of Mahendra (245 B. C.) two, if not three, convocations of the Buddhist clergy had already been held and their scriptures finally settled, and the books carried must have been what were so settled at the convocations, and these were certainly not written in Pāli or Māgadhi ; for the Pāli of the Pitakataya is not the Pāli of Aśoka's edicts, and the Māgadhi, as we know it, could not have been in existence when the Pāli was current, for it is unquestionably a later evolution of the Sanskrit than the Pāli. To say the Māgadhi of the original texts must have been different from the dramatic Māgadhi, is to give up the contention altogether, for we then come to something unknown and non-existent. It follows consequently, that the premises with which the advocates of the Pāli theory start must fall to the ground, and with them the conclusion about the claim of the Pāli to be the language of the original texts.

The discovery of the Chinese translations of original Buddhist records has placed in the hands of scholars a new mass of evidence which goes a great way to solve this vexed question. These records are avowed to be translations, not from Tibetan or Pāli texts, but from the Fan, the language of the Brāhmaṇs, i. e., the Sanskrit. Some of these translations date from the 1st century of the Christian era, and most of them were prepared between the 3rd and the 9th centuries. These facts incontestably prove the existence of some Sanskrit originals at a time long anterior to the date of the Pāli translations of Ceylon.

The question then arises, are the MSS. discovered by Mr. Hodgson the representatives of those originals ? That some of them are not so, and of comparatively recent date, is fully admitted ; but there are others whose claims to authenticity and antiquity cannot be questioned. Their names are given in the Chinese versions, and that circumstance alone is sufficient to vindicate the justice of their claim. It is to be regretted that the public has not before it translations of all these Chinese versions to compare with Mr. Hodgson's Sanskrit texts, but from what little it has, ample evidence is found in favour of the Nepalese texts. The Ceylonese, the Burmese and the Siamese versions of the life of Śākya as preserved in Pāli are deeply tinged with local colouring. They give us pictures of the places where they were produced, and not of India, and the languages in which they are preserved are of a much later date than even the monumental Pāli of Asoka,* whereas the Chinese version, as seen in Mr. Beal's Romantic Legend of Śākya Buddha, is purely Indian, perfectly devoid of local colouring, and it is impossible to believe that it had been taken from any Pāli original.

Mr. Beal's work is a mutilated version of the original Chinese, many descriptive portions being omitted ; but such as it is, it "is a translation of the Chinese version of the Abhinishkramaṇa Sūtra done into that language by Djnanakuta, a Buddhist priest from North India, who resided in China during the Tsui dynasty, i. e., about the end of the sixth century A. D. It would seem from a consideration of the title of the seventeenth chapter, 'Leaving the palace for religious life,' that originally the story of the 'Abhinishkramaṇa' was simply that of Buddha's flight from his palace to become an ascetic. Afterwards, the same title was applied to the complete legend (as in the present work), which includes his previous and subsequent history. A very valuable date, later than which we cannot place the origin of the story, may be derived from the colophon at the end of the last chapter of the book. It is there stated that the 'Abhinishkramaṇa Sūtra' is called by the school of Dharmaguptas Fo-pen-hing-king ; by the Sārvāstivādas it is called Ta-chwang-yen (great magnificence, i. e., Lalita-Vistara) ; by the Mahāsaṅghikas it is called Ta-sse, i. e., Mahāvastu." (Beal's Introduction, p. v.) This description shows that it is made up of three distinct Sanskrit works, the Abhinishkramaṇa Sūtra, the Lalita-Vistara, and the Mahāvastu,—all relating to the life of Buddha, and it is hopeless to expect that it should closely represent any one of the three originals. It is observable, too, that Asiatic translators have never observed the rigid scrupulousness of the modern European rules about faithful translation, where the ipsissima verba of the original are carefully preserved, and even the turn of the style, language and idiom is attempted to be reproduced. Ordinarily a general concordance in feature is all that Asiatics think necessary, and much latitude is allowed in ornamentation. It is, nevertheless, not difficult to show which parts of the Chinese version have been taken from which work, for the correspondence in language even in the purely descriptive portions, which refer not to the speeches of the principal actors is as close as can reasonably be expected, if we bear in mind the peculiarities of the Sanskrit and the Chinese idioms. To give an instance : chapter VII of the Chinese version (page 35), giving an account of the descent of the Bodhisattva, opens with the following :

“At this time Prabhāpāla Bodhisattva, the Winter being now passed, and the opening month of Spring arrived, when all the flowers and the trees put out their scents, the vernal air, soft and serene, neither too cold nor hot, the young grass and other verdure freshly come forth, brightly shining on every side, at the time of the junction of the constellation Kwei (with the sun)” &c.

This subject is treated of in the 6th chapter of the Lalita-Vistara and in my translation (p. 94) it commences with the words :

“Thus, Bhikshus, the Winter having passed away, in the fullness of the Spring season, in the month of Vaiśākha, when the sun was in the constellation Viśākhā, the trees were covered with leaves, and loaded with exquisite flowers and blossoms. The earth was covered with a carpet of green. The evils of great heat or cold were then absent, and everywhere there was calm and quietness. At such a time the Bodhisattva &c. &c.”

It is obvious that the translators have arranged their words and sentences with a keen eye to the English idiom, and the Chinese translation has judiciously omitted the name of the Hindu month which would have been useless and puzzling to Chinese readers, the name of the constellation being quite sufficient for them. These divergences apart, it is undeniable that this portion of the Chinese version is a counterpart of the Sanskrit Lalita-Vistara as we have in Mr. Hodgson's collection. Other instances of such close correspondence in language may be multiplied ad libitum, and the portions taken from the Mahāvastu also afford similar correspondence ; but we look in vain for such coincidences in the Southern versions. There even the speeches of the saint and his divine mother, which from their sanctity should have been most faithfully preserved, appear to be quite distorted. The details, too, of the narrative have been very materially altered, so as to show that we have in them an imperfect outline of the story and its substance. To give an instance. The Lalita-Vistara gives the dream of Māyā in these words :

“A noble elephant, white as silver or snow, having six tusks, well-proportioned trunk and feet, blood-red veins, adamant firmness of joints, and easy pace, has entered my belly.” (p. 94)

The Tibetan version has :

"Un éléphant blanc comme la neige et l'argent, à six défenses, aux pieds, à la trompe superbes, à la tête rouge, à la démarche agréable, aux membres forts comme le diamant, le plus beau des éléphants entraînait en elle, et jamais elle n'avait vu, ni entendu (dire) qu'on éprouvât un pareil bien-être." (Foucaux, p. 61)

The Chinese text has :

"Bôdhisatwa having then descended into the womb of Mâya the Queen, she in the midst of her sleep had a dream to this effect, 'she thought she saw a six-tusked white elephant, his head coloured like a ruby (or red pearl) &c. descend thro' space and enter her right side.' " (Beal, p. 37.)

All these three Northern versions it will be seen, are closely similar, and unquestionably produced from one source. But we fail to perceive anything like this similitude in the Southern narratives. The Burmese version of Bishop Bigandet (p. 29) says :

"Opposite this mount and facing the cave where Maia sat surrounded by her attendants, rose another mount, where Phralaong, under the shape of a young white elephant, was roaming over its sides in various directions. He was soon seen coming down that hill, and ascending the one where the princess lay on her bed, directed his course towards the cave. On the extremity of his trunk, lifted up like a beautiful string of flowers, he carried a white lily. His voice, occasionally resounding through the air, could be heard distinctly by the inmates of the grotto, and indicated his approach. He soon entered the cave, turned three times round the couch whereupon sat the princess, then, standing for a while, he came nearer, opened her right side, and appeared to conceal himself in her womb."

The Siamese version follows this account pretty closely, but not quite faithfully. It says :

"Then they led her to a golden palace, standing on a silver mountain, and prayed her to rest on a couch with her face turned to the west. Then she saw a golden mountain, whereon the Royal Being that should be Buddha marched in the form of a white elephant. The most admirable of white elephants, leaving the mountain of gold, came to the foot of the mountain of silver, and passed round to its northern side. In his beautiful trunk he held a newly expanded white lotus flower. He ascended the mountain, and having trumpeted loudly, entered the golden palace. Thrice he marched around the couch, and at the end of the third circuit, he appeared to enter her right side, and pass into her womb." (Alabaster's Wheel of the Law, p. 98).

None, I venture to think, will be disposed to accept these Pāli versions to be the archetypes of the Chinese text, or to doubt for a moment that the Sanskrit original as we have it in Mr. Hodgson's collection supplied the model for it. If so, the fact being admitted that the first Chinese version of the Lalita-Vistara was prepared in the first century of the Christian era, the inference is unavoidable that the Sanskrit original had existed for at least two to three centuries before that time to have acquired the necessary antiquity and religious authority to be fit for acceptance as the scriptures of the Buddhists, and worthy of translation by the people of China. This brings us to the Convocation held under the auspices of Aśoka ; but for the reasons assigned in the Introduction to my edition of the Lalita-Vistara, it is impossible to believe that that work was produced on that occasion (cf. pp. 56-7), and we must go back to the synod of Kālāśoka. Now, the Lalita-Vistara as we have it at present is a compound of two different works—a prose version in pure Sanskrit, which substantiates its statements by quotations from a metrical and simpler version in the Gāthā dialect. I pointed out this fact twenty-seven years ago (Journal As. Soc. for 1856), and it has since been generally accepted. At the last Oriental Congress, held at St. Petersburg, it was announced as a new fact, but in no way controverted. The interval between the synod of Kālāśoka and the Nirvāṇa cannot be extended to much more than a hundred to a hundred and forty years. If we admit the originality of the Pāli we have to believe that within that period, the original life of the saint in Pāli was first rendered into Gāthā and then into Sanskrit, and that the most ancient and authentic Pāli having been lost, the author of the Sanskrit text was obliged to quote the Gāthā for his authority. This would be absurd, and the Pāli theory must, therefore, be abandoned.

It is to be regretted that evidence is wanting to prove in the above way the authenticity of the other works of the collection under notice ; but the evidence available in favour of the assumption that the more revered portions of the scriptures were compiled at the same, or about the same, time at which the Lalita-Vistara was got up is by no means stunted. It would be unreasonable and opposed to every law of inference to suppose that the Lalita-Vistara was the only work got up at the time ; and if any faith is to be placed in the accounts of the convocations, held avowedly to preserve the scriptures from corruption and interpolation, and to settle disputed points of doctrine and of discipline, the conclusion is forced on us that several works, besides the Lalita-Vistara, were compiled on those occasions. And as a number of Mr. Hodgson's texts are written in the same style as that of the Lalita-Vistara, and quote the Gāthās in support of their statements, it would be perfectly reasonable to accept them to be of the same age. Moreover, as the Gāthā was not adequate for the precision necessary for abstruse philosophical discussions, and no language existed in India in former times which was so well fitted for the definition of various shades of philosophical thought as the Sanskrit, it would be by no means unreasonable to suppose that Sanskrit alone, without the Gāthā, was used for philosophical works, and as the philosophy of Buddhism form the corner-stone of the doctrine of Buddha, some works on the subject must have existed from the earliest date. At any rate, the Pāli originals of the present Sanskrit works must first be found before the argument above set forth can be fairly traversed. This argument is the same which Pāli scholars used before the discovery of the Sanskrit texts, and it is perfectly legitimate.

There was a time when it was urged that the rational character of the Pāli narrative was of itself proof sufficient for their antiquity and originality, and James Prinsep went the length of admitting that "if the rationality of a story be a fair test of its genuineness, which few will deny, the Pāli record will here bear away the palm." The publication of some of the original Pāli texts has since completely set this argument at rest. The quotations given above leave us little room for choice on the score of rationality. They are alike legendary, and full of romantic fables. Were they otherwise, still the question at issue would not be influenced one way or other by it. Plausibility is no proof in law, nor can it be in history. If we admit the reverse of the position, we have to accept all the society novels and stories of the day as history. The argument is that the Chinese texts were taken from Sanskrit originals, and that those originals are now before us in the MSS. discovered by Mr. Hodgson ; and this is borne out by their close correspondence in name, language and matter. If this be admitted, as it must be, the high value of the discovery cannot be gainsaid.

This question, however, of the antiquity of the MSS. apart, the services rendered by Mr. Hodgson to the cause of literature and science generally have called forth the warmest acknowledgments from all who are able to appreciate them. The quotations given above, express the opinion of some of the ablest critics on the subject, and associated bodies have not been slow in bearing their testimony to their value. The Asiatic Society of Bengal, whose transactions have been so greatly enriched by the contributions of Mr. Hodgson, presented him, on the occasion of his retirement from India, an address, elected him an Honorary member, and voted a marble bust which now adorns its meeting-room. The Royal Society of London, the highest scientific association on the face of the earth, elected him a Fellow ; and another body no less distinguished and more exclusive, the French Academy, elected him a Foreign Member. The dignity of the Knighthood of the Legion of Honor, was bestowed on him by the French Government. He has now retired from the field of active labour, carrying with him the respect and esteem of all cultivators of science, and the warmest wishes of his friends and admirers for his long life and prosperity in his happy home in Gloucestershire.

To turn now to the immediate object of this Preface. The total number of MSS. presented by Mr. Hodgson to the Asiatic Society of Bengal was 86 bundles, including 170 separate works on various subjects. They vary in extent from a few ślokas to a hundred and twenty thousand stanzas. The great bulk of the works refers to the history, philosophy, morality, and rituals of the religion of Buddha ; a few are devoted to miscellaneous subjects. To classify them according to the scheme of the Nepalese Buddhists as described by Mr. Hodgson in his essays, (pp. 11 f.), I find, is impracticable. The codices do not in their colophons always give the names of the classes to which they belong, and the definitions of the classes as supplied to Mr. Hodgson by his informants are obviously arbitrary, and do not suffice to help me. An old classified catalogue would have been of much use ; but such a record does not exist. Taking no note of a primer on grammar,* another on versification,† a collection of moral maxims,‡ obviously Hindu, a commentary on a Jain astronomical work,§ a treatise on precious stones,|| and a few rituals, the whole of the works are narrative, in each case the author relating what he had heard himself or from some one of what Buddha said on particular occasions about particular subjects, and in so far the form of the works supply no clue to their classification. The subjects, too, are not unoften so varied in each work that they afford no help. The threefold division of the Southern Buddhists—the Sūtra, the Vinaya, and the Abhidharma—is nowhere prominently marked in the Nepalese texts. Judging by the nature of the works, the Sūtras may be said to be represented by the “nine dharmas” of the Nepalese. Some of them are called † Chhandomṛta-latā.

‡ Chānakya-sārasaṅgraha.

§ Surya-prajñapti-ṭikā.

|| Maṇi-parīkshā.

Mahāyāna, others Mahāvaipulya, but none Sūtra only. M. Burnouf takes the simple Sūtras to be the most ancient, but on insufficient grounds, for he had only one work of the kind before him, and it was by no means a satisfactory one. I have none to refer to.

The Vinaya by name is represented by a single commentary on a work which is not included in the collection before me, and, to judge from the character of the commentary, I have in it a treatise on philosophy, and not on moral discipline as the class is said to include. M. Burnouf noticed this absence in the collection which he examined. He says, (p. 33) "la collection de M. Hodgson n'offre pas d'ouvrages qui se placent dans la classe du Vinaya, comme elle en possède qui appartiennent à celle des Sūtras. Dans les deux listes que j'ai citées plus haut, le nom de Vinaya ne se présente qu'une seule fois, et encore n'est-il pas employé avec ce caractère de généralité qu'il a dans l'expression de Vinaya piṭaka 'le Recueil de la discipline.' Il figure seulement sur le titre d'un traité philosophique, le Vinaya sūtra, dont j'ai indiqué l'existence tout à l'heure, et duquel il me suffit de dire en ce moment qu'il n'est pas attribué à Çākyamuni." It is obvious, however, that the moral stories which figure so prominently in the collection under the name of Avadāna, are the representatives of Vinaya works. The stories are intended to illustrate the deserts of virtue and vice, and pro tanto they are lessons on morality. In Ceylon there is a large class of works under the name of Jātakas. These narrate the prominent incidents in the former lives of Śākyā Buddha. Many stories in the Nepalese collection also bear the same common name, but they occur in compilations which have the generic title of Avadānas. In fact, the Avadāna of the Nepalese is the class of which the Jātaka is an order. The former treats of the anterior lives of Śākyā Buddha as well as of other persons, whereas the latter is confined to Śākyā only.

The Abhidharma of the Ceylonese includes philosophical works ; and the Prajñāpāramitās and their commentaries take its place in the Nepalese collection.

Apart from the above, there is a large number of works in the Nepalese collection which bear the name of Dhāraṇī. They begin in the usual style of Sūtra works, with the set form, "thus has it been heard by me, that when Bhagavān sojourned in such a place," &c., &c., and, like the Sūtras, bear no author's name, and in this respect they may be called simple Sūtras, but they supply, each one or more, charms to be worn as amulets, and must be of a much later date than that of Śākya Buddha and his earlier disciples. The atheistic and the later theistic Bauddhas could not have invoked the name, as the Dhāraṇīs do, of Tārā, or Vajrasattva, or Avalokiteśvara to preserve them from snake-bites, malarial fevers, and demons. They are obviously imitations of the Hindu Kavachas from the Tantras, of which a great many were translated into Tibetan between the 7th and 13th centuries of the Christian era.

Believing in the authenticity and great historical value of the MSS. presented to the Asiatic Society by Mr. Hodgson, Mr. Arthur Grote, when President of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, often urged me to examine them and prepare an analysis of their contents ; but the magnitude of the task deterred me. The total number of the MSS. was 86 bundles representing, according to the Indian mode of reckoning, nearly a million and a half of verses, written in the, to me, very unfamiliar Newārī character, bristling with errors, full of uncouth and unknown technical terms, and abounding in quotations in a dialect which was but imperfectly intelligible to me. To master them thoroughly was the task of a lifetime, and, having regard to my official and other pressing works, I could not take it up. Mr. Grote, however, did not like to see his project dropped altogether, and, after his retirement from India, suggested the plan of dividing the task among two or more persons, and the Council of the Asiatic Society having accepted it, and agreed to defray the cost of preparing and printing an analysis, Paṇḍit Harināth Vidyāratna was employed to read the texts and prepare, under my direction and supervision, abstracts of their contents in Sanskrit. The Paṇḍit read about two-thirds of the total number of the texts. Paṇḍit Rāmanāth Tarkaratna read the large Prajñāpāramitā, and Paṇḍit Kāmākhyānāth Tarkavāgiśa three of the smaller works. The rest fell to my lot. I had also frequently to compare the Paṇḍits' abstracts with the originals, and this involved the necessity of a great deal of very hard and tedious reading. It was originally intended that I should translate all the abstracts into English, but during a protracted attack of illness, I felt the want of help, and a friend of mine, Bābu Haraprasād Śāstrī, M. A., offered me his co-operation, and translated the abstracts of 16 of the larger works. His initials have been attached to the names of those works in the table of contents. I feel deeply obliged to him for the timely aid he rendered me, and tender him my cordial acknowledgments for it. His thorough mastery of the Sanskrit language and knowledge of European literature fully qualified him for the task ; and he did his work to my entire satisfaction. I must add, however, that I did not deem it necessary, nor had I the opportunity, to compare all his renderings with the originals. In preparing the abstracts it was found that my Paṇḍits could not always master the true import of the philosophical terminology of the Buddhists, nor could they condense with sufficient clearness the diffuse disquisitions about obscure dogmas to make them fit for presentation to the public. The attempt, therefore, to review the dogmas was abandoned, and attention was directed mainly to the narratives and the stories about the previous births of Buddha, which have been so largely illustrated in the ancient sculptures of India. Even in this respect, however, some limit had to be put to the length of the stories. Some of the stories are very long, extending over a hundred to two hundred pages, and all are decked out with a good deal of descriptive ornaments and tedious details. To reproduce them in their entirety would require not one, but many, volumes, and I had, therefore, to satisfy myself with their bare outlines—their skeletons—omitting all flesh and blood which give them their vividness and interest for the faithful. But reduced and attenuated as they are in the following pages, they will, I believe, prove useful in elucidating Buddhist traditions and sculpture, and in conveying a fair idea of the nature and contents of the newly discovered literature.

THE SANSKRIT BUDDHIST LITERATURE OF NEPAL

No. B. 26.

ABHIDHĀNOTTARA ALIAS AVADĀNA-STOTRA TANTRA.

Substance, yellow Nepalese paper, 12×3. Folia 205. Lines on a page, 6. Extent in ślokas, 3100. Character, Newāri. Date, Newāri Samvat 805=A.C. 1685. Appearance, old. Prose and verse. Very incorrect.

A treatise of the Tantra class, containing mystic mantras and directions for the worship of demigods and good and evil spirits of various kinds. Anonymous. The scene is laid in the abode of a Guhyaka of the name of Vajrakrodha Ḍākinī, ("the imp of lightning passion,") where the great Tathāgata Vajrasattva once sojourned. There certain other Tathāgatas solicit him to impart to them a knowledge of the secret science of destroying the net of the imp of lightning passion (Vajrakrodha-ḍākinī-jāla-samvarābhinottarottara-hridaya,—the full name of the work); and the knowledge is imparted in a series of sixty-five lectures. After defining the time, the place, and the persons fit for the worship of various kinds of imps, the spirit of Vajrasattva is directed to be meditated upon in the essence of certain letters of the alphabet, which constitute the vijamantras. In his heart the worshipper should reflect upon a central point, and over it the syllable yam forming a blue atmosphere, thereupon a brilliant red triangular halo formed by the syllable ram, thereupon a frost-like watery glow formed by the syllable vam, and thereupon a four-cornered yellow-coloured terrene globe formed by the syllable lam. He must then meditate on the wheel diagram, which he should imagine to consist of eight red-coloured spokes placed on the globe aforesaid. The form of the demigoddess is fierce, four-mouthed, twelve-armed, &c., and the vijamantra for her is Om hum āh mahāsukham. In this way the rituals for the performance of the rites and the worship of certain other divinities named are given at length. The divinities, imps, and rites are : Śamvaravajra, Piṭhaparva, Vajrasattva, Piṭhadevatā, Bheruka, Yogavīra, Piṭhamālā, Mātrikābheda, Ādikarmika-yoga, Vajravīra, Sadyoga-samvara, Amrita-sanjivani, (raising the dead), Yogini, Kulaḍāka, Yoginī-yoga-hridaya, Buddha-kāpālīka Yoga, Vajrasattva, Manjuvajra, Navākṣharāliḍāka, Vajraḍāka, Varshāyana, Kavachadvaya, Chomaka, Dākini Chomaka, consecration of pictures, daily service for Yoginis, meditation on the seven-syllabic mantra, Vajra-yoga-sādhana, Gardhavākāra-yoga, the five cries, the fourfold goddess, Vajrabhairava-krodhādhipati yoga, meditation on Vajrakrodha, Janmapaśubhāvanā, and Ātmabhāva. The Yoginis, whose worship is particularly enjoined, are described as women fair as the pith of the lotus stalk, with lotus-like pink eyes, fond of white garments, odorous as fresh sandal paste, and devoted to the adoration of Sugata and his successors. There are several kinds of these ; some are called Kulajās, others Brāhmīs, others Rudrās. The Dākinīs are women of a bright red complexion, having the aroma of the lotus, benign countenances, red eyes and nails, and fondness for decorating their rooms with pictures of lotus flowers. They belonging to the race of Padmanetra. In course of the work several charms and amulets are given to protect persons from the attacks of evil spirits, diseases and other evils.

ABHIDHARMAKOŚA-VYĀKHYĀ.

Substance, Nepalese paper of a yellow colour, 18×6. Folia, 338. Lines on a page, 12 to 13. Extent in ślokas, 19,266. Character, Newāri. Date, ? Prose. Generally correct.

A series of Aphorisms on the principles of Buddhist philosophy. By Vasubandhu. With an elaborate commentary, by Yasomitra Āchārya. The aphorisms are brief and terse, and so constructed as to express their meaning by their case-marks, without the aid of verbs, as is the case with the Sūtras of Brāhmanical writers, and totally unlike the Sūtras of the Buddhists, which are generally loose, verbose and prolix. The commentary also follows the style of the Hindu philosophers, and discusses the questions raised, with reference to their philosophical bearings, but supplies no vṛitti or literal meaning. The logical precision of the Hindu writers is, however, to some extent wanting, both in the text and the commentary : the categories are also different. The work is divided into eight chapters, each called a Kośasthāna or 'receptacle.' The first chapter opens with a discussion about dharma or religious duty, which is said to be of two kinds,—one Sāśrava leading to transmigration, and the other Anāśrava, or that which effects emancipation from the bond of mundane existence. Then follow descriptions of the twelve sentient organs which constitute corporeality; these include the five sensory organs, eyes, ears, &c., and seven desires, collectively called the adhyātmika dhātus. The second treats of organic and mental functions (indriya), which are reckoned at twenty-two. They comprise vision, audition, smelling, taste, touch, living, thinking (manas), femininity, masculinity, sensation of pleasure, ditto of pain, ditto of ease, ditto of uneasiness, ditto of indifference, ditto of earnestness, ditto of vigour, the sense of memory, ditto of meditation, ditto of knowledge, the desire of command over unknown persons (anājñātamājñāsyāmīndriya) that of command (ājñēndriya), the sense of being commanded, (ājñāteṇdriya). The third treats of the different order of beings (kāmadhātu) resulting from our carnal desires, kāma. The subject of the fourth chapter is the relation which our actions bear to our future life, or the manifestation of the soul in different forms of animal life in accordance with actions performed in previous lives. The fifth describes the pain and suffering resulting from transmigration. The sixth refers to meditation on the attributes of the Deity (Īśvara). The seventh treats of knowledge, which is of two kinds, carnal (Laukika) and transcendental or that which results from Yoga meditation. The eighth explains Samādhi or concentration of the mind on the Divinity—the only means of salvation open to man.

The work is of great importance as a repository of the various metaphysical theories of the early Buddhists. It takes up, one after another, all the various topics which engaged their attention ; points out their character ; notices their authors ; decides upon their merits with great tact and learning ; and forms altogether a valuable work of reference on the subject. M. Burnouf, in his Introduction à l'Histoire du Bouddhisme Indien (p. 563), has the following appreciative remarks on this work : Les observations les plus générales entre celles que m'a suggérées l'examen de ce volumineux traité embrassent trois points principaux. Le premier concerne la rédaction et la système du commentateur ; le second, les indications qu'il donne sur d'autres ouvrages, indépendamment du sujet qu'il traite ; la troisième porte sur le sujet lui-même. En ce qui touche la rédaction et le système du commentateur, il faut reconnaître qu'il appartient à la bonne école des glossateurs indiens. Yaçômitra possédait certainement toutes les ressources de la langue sanskrite, et il en a fait un excellent usage pour explication du texte primitif. Sa glose est à la fois grammaticale et philosophique. Il suit, pour la grammaire, l'école de Pāṇini ; et quant au système philosophique, il développe les opinions exposées ou seulement indiquées, dans ceux des livres canoniques qu'on nomme Sūtras. De là vient la qualité de Sautrāntika ou philosophe de l'école des Sūtras, qu'il prend dans un grand nombre de passages. Sous ce rapport, les indications que renferme ce commentaire sont aussi nombreuses que variées, et on y rencontre presque à chaque page des fragments plus ou moins étendus de ces traités, dont plusieurs se retrouvent dans les volumes que nous possédons à Paris. L'examen d'un tel livre met à mes yeux l'authenticité des Sūtras à l'abri de toute contestation ; et il rend à la littérature sacrée des Bouddhistes un service du même genre que celui que les commentaires philosophiques des Brāhmanes rendent aux Védas, qu'ils citent à tout instant."

AŚOKA AVADĀNA.

Substance, Nepalese paper of a yellow colour, 16×5". Folia, 276. Lines on a page, 8. Extent in ślokas, 9, 660. Character, Newāri. Appearance, old. Verse. Incorrect.

An account of the early life of Aśoka, and of his conversion to Buddhism, and tales and anecdotes related to him by a Yati named Upa Gupta, with a view to illustrate the morality of the Bauddha religion. The name of the author is not given, but the work professes to be a record of the history of Aśoka which a sage, named Jayaśrī, related to his audience at the Kukkuṭa Vihāra, situated in a garden called Upa-kaṇṭhikārāma, on the bank of the Ganges at Pāṭaliputra. There is a Kukkuṭa Vihāra in Behar, but that is not on the bank of the Ganges ; this must therefore be different.

Mr. Hodgson says the class of works called Avadāna includes treatises on "the fruits of actions or moral law of mundane existence."* According to Burnouf : "Ils s'occupent, en effet, comme le dit la liste nepalaise, du fruit des œuvres ; qui signifie légende, récit légendaire, ainsi que l'entend Csoma de Cörös, d'après les interprètes tibetains de Kahgyur. Ces légendes roulent d'ordinaire sur ces deux sujets, l'explication des actions présentes par les actions passées, et l'annonce des récompenses ou des peines réservées pour l'avenir aux actions présentes. Ce double objet est, on le voit, nettement résumé dans la définition de la listes népalaise, à laquelle il ne manque que la traduction littérale du mot sanskrite."†

The conclusions arrived at by Burnouf are—1st, that the Avadānas of the Nepalese represent the second division of the Buddhist scriptures, or that which includes the Vinaya or discipline. 2nd, That this discipline is not taught dogmatically as in the Sūtras, but illustrated by examples, anecdotes and stories. 3rd, That they refer to all matters relating to Buddhist rules of conduct, both for householders and for the clergy, and monks, as well as to forms of rituals, and mode of life under all circumstances. 4th, That we have in them the history of Buddhism both of the time of Śākyā, and of his successors for a long period.†

‡ Ibid, p. 47.

These facts will be illustrated at length in the analyses which will follow of the several Avadānas which occur in the collection now under notice.

The genealogy of Aśoka begins with Bimbisāra, king of Rājagriha, who was a contemporary of Śākya. His lineal descendants successively were—

| 4. Muṇḍa. | 9. Prasenañjit. |
| 5. Kākavarṇi. | 10. Nanda. |
| 6. Sahali. | 11. Vindusāra. |

These names occur in the life of Aśoka given in the Divya Avadāna, except the 2nd, 3rd, 4th and 7th which have been differently given, Ajātasattu appearing for Mahipāla, Udayin for Udayiśa, Muiyā or Udayibhava, for Muṇḍa and Tulakuchi for Turakuri or Turakuvi. In the absence of necessary MSS. it is impossible to ascertain how far these differences are due to copyist's errors. Apparently they are. The lists given in the Pāli annals and in the Viṣṇu Purāṇa are more seriously discrepant. They stand thus :—

| 12. Chandragupta. | |
| 13. Vindusāra. | |

The other Purāṇas give many different versions of the names above noted, (see Mr. Hall's Notes in loco cit.). The Pāli names are obviously not so authentic as the Buddhist ones from Nepal. The latter were very early translated into the Chinese and have therefore better claim to confidence. At the same time it should be observed that the omission of the name of Chandragupta from the latter is significant.

Coupled with the fact mentioned by the Nepalese writer that Vindusāra came to Magadha from Rājagriha, it suggests the idea that Chandragupta was the sole king of his race, and that the Mauriya line commenced and ended with him. The Pāli annals make Vindusāra the son of Chandragupta. If so he could not have come from Rājagriha to take possession of his ancestral kingdom of Magadha. This is, however, not the place to enter into a discussion on the subject.

According to the work under notice Vindusāra of Rājagriha became the king of Pāṭaliputra, and his eldest son was Susima. When Vindusāra was reigning at Pāṭaliputra, a Brāhman of Chāmpāpuri presented to him a daughter named Subhadrāṅgī. The damsel was extraordinarily beautiful, and a soothsayer having foretold that she would be the wife of a great king and mother of a universal monarch, the father made the present with a view to help the prophecy. The immediate fruit of this presentation did not, however, prove satisfactory to Subhadrāṅgī. Immured in the palace she was, through the jealousy of the princesses of the zenana, doomed to menial service. Among other low occupations she was ordered to acquire the art of a barber, whereby, she was told, she would gain the goodwill of the king. When well proficient in the art she was ordered by the princesses to go and shave the king. She did so, and acquitted herself so well that the king offered to grant her any boon she wished. She prayed for his society ; but the king denounced her on account of her being of the low caste of a barber. She explained that she was only acting the part of a barber by order of the princesses of the palace, but that she was a Brāhmaṇī by birth, and had been presented to the king expressly with a view to his marrying her. The king, thus reminded of her history, granted her wish, and made her the chief queen of the palace. Aśoka was the first fruit of this union. He was so named because the mother emancipated herself from her sufferings by his birth, the word meaning "griefless." The lady had a second son named Vigataśoka, which word has a similar meaning. Aśoka was very unruly and troublesome, and his father made him over for training to an astrologer, named Piṅgalavatsa, who foretold that the boy would succeed his father on the throne of Pāṭaliputra.

When the prince had attained his majority, his character did not mend ; he was found so troublesome, that it was deemed advisable to get rid of him by deputing him to quell a mutiny which had broken out at Takshaśilā, at a great distance from the seat of the empire. His efforts proved successful, and he was well received by the people of that place. In the meantime his elder brother Susima created disturbances at Pāṭilputra, and offended the chief minister, through whose intrigue he too was sent to Takshaṣilā, and Aśoka was recalled therefrom.

Soon after, the king fell ill, appointed Aśoka his successor through the instigation of the minister, but, much against his own will, and died. Susima, disappointed of his patrimony, rose against his younger brother, and attacked Pāṭaliputra ; but Aśoka, through his able minister Rādha Gupta, soon overpowered him, and, to prevent future disturbances ordered his ministers "to lop off the heads of all the trees in the royal garden with their flowers and fruits," in the same sense in which Tarquin the Proud lopped off the heads of the "tallest poppies" in his garden to instruct his son as to what he should do. The ministers demurred, and so he himself struck off their heads, and, retiring to a garden with the ladies of the palace, enjoyed the pleasures of life to the utmost.

Noticing one day that some of the ladies had broken the branches of an Aśoka tree, he was very much annoyed, and directed a wicked man named Chanḍagirika, "the fierce mountaineer", to burn them to ashes on a large fire, and this was immediately done. The mountaineer, however, soon after met his deserts. Sārthavāha, a rich merchant, had proceeded to sea in the company of a hundred other merchants, and there had a son born unto him, who was named Samudra. On his way home, after twelve years, falling into the hands of pirates, he was deprived of all his effects, and murdered along with all his companions. His son Samudra alone escaped, and led the life of a beggar. Once he came to the house of the mountaineer to beg alms, and was set upon, but could not by any means be murdered. Surprised at it, the mountaineer reported the circumstances to Aśoka. The king came to see the strange beggar, heard everything from him, and then cut off the head of the mountaineer.

The miracle wrought by the beggar worked on the mind of the king ; and he became attached to the religion of Buddha. He caused a chaitya to be erected at the Kukkuṭa garden, and deposited in it some relics of Buddha. He then caused a chaitya and other religious edifices to be erected at Rāmagrāma. Coming thence to the river Ganges, he was requested by the Nāgas to go to their country, and there he caused religious edifices to be erected. At the request of the people of Takshaṣilā, he caused 3,510,000,000 stupas to be erected for the deposit of relics. By his order the Yakshas erected, on the shores of the sea, ten million stupas for the same purpose.

After this a son was born unto him named Kunāla, who soon distinguished himself in all that was taught him.

Subsequently, on one occasion Aśoka went to a Yati, at the Kukkuṭa garden, to study the true religion, and, at the suggestion of that recluse, sent for, from the Urumuṇḍa Hill, a Yati named Upa Gupta, whom he assigned the monastery of Venuvana, or the "Bamboo Grove." This saint was the son of Gupta, a rich man of Mathurā, who had been converted by one Soṇavāsī, a mendicant who resided on the Urumuṇḍa Hill, and presented his three sons Aśva Gupta, Dhana Gupta and Upa Gupta to his tutor. A prophecy of Buddha is quoted, according to which the birth of Upa Gupta was to take place a hundred years after his demise (mama nirvṛtimārabhya śatavarshagate upaguptanāma bhikshurutpatsyati.) (Fol. 23-2-1.) This chronology, however, does not accord with the statement that Aśoka was the thirteenth from Bimbisāra, a contemporary of the great teacher. A contemporary of Aśoka could scarcely be born within a hundred years of the reformer's death. Such a prophecy, however, was needed to exalt the rank of the great teacher who became the spiritual guide of so mighty a sovereign as Aśoka. Having studied Buddhism under this tutor Aśoka caused, at every Buddhist resort, a Maṭha to be established for the adoration of the "Three Jewels."

When the teacher retired to his own hermitage, Aśoka caused a proclamation to be issued declaring Buddhism to be the religion of his country. His chief queen Pavishyarakshitā was, however, annoyed at his forsaking the old family religion, and, through a secret agent, got the sacred tree where adoration was paid, to be cut down. Aśoka was much grieved at this ; but, through the miraculous power of his religion, he restored it to life. He deputed Supiṇḍola Bharadvāja, a Yati, from the Mandār Hill, to preach the true religion everywhere over his empire, and celebrated with great pomp the quinquennial humiliation and conference, giving a great profusion of wealth, raiment and food to the clergy.

About this time he also celebrated the marriage of his son Kunāla with a maiden named Kānchanamālā, and soon after deputed the son to quell an insurrection in Takshaśilā, a distant province, which seems to have been ill at ease under the house of Bimbisāra. Kunjarakarna, the chief of the rebels, succumbed to the powerful army which followed the prince, and peace was soon restored. The insurrection, however, would appear to be a feint, and the real reason, as in the case of Susima and Aśoka himself, was the removal of a troublesome prince from near the throne ; for it is stated, apparently by way of euphemism, that soon after the deputation, the king saw in a dream the prince's face all pale, haggard, and dried up, and, being informed by astrologers that that portended one of three things, viz. loss of life, retirement from the world as a hermit, or loss of sight, wrote a letter to Kunjarakarna to deprive the prince of his eyesight, as the least of the three evils. The mandate was duly carried out through the instrumentality of a Chaṇḍāla—the task having been held as too cruel to be executed by any person of a higher caste. It is not a noteworthy fact that after this Viśāoka, the younger brother of the king, should retire to the hermitage of Upa Gupta, and afterwards accept from Guṇākara, a disciple of that teacher, consecration as a houseless hermit. This renunciation of the world did not, however, enable him to escape with his life. It so happened that at this time a professor of the Nirgrantha school, who reviled the religion of Buddha, had got a picture painted, representing himself with the likeness of Buddha lying at his feet, and this he had circulated widely in the province of Puṇḍravardhana, and Aśoka, hearing of it, had proclaimed a price (some dinars) on his head. A cow-herd (Ābhira) had heard of this, and one night taking Viśāoka, with his long beard, matted hair, and unkempt nails, to be the Nirgrantha, cut off his head, and presented it to the king with a view to obtain the promised reward. The sight of the head deeply grieved the king ; and he sought from Upa Gupta, his spiritual guide, religious consolation for his many acts of cruelty.

A hundred folia of the text are devoted to the life of Aśoka as given above. The incidents narrated are the same as those given in the Divya Avadāna, translated by Burnouf ;* but the language is different, the one being a prose work, and the other a poetical version. The rest of the work is made up of lectures delivered by the teacher for the consolation of his royal pupil.

The first lecture is devoted to the celebration of a fast in honor of a chaitya (chaitya-vrata), and the religious merit derivable therefrom. The second expatiates on the merits of devotion to Buddha, and on the propriety of confessing to him one's sins, praying for redemption. The third is on desire to be useful to mankind. The next five lectures have for their themes, contentment (samprasāda) ; the suppression of the passions and indifference to carnal suffering (kshānti-pāramitā) ; relinquishment of words tending to birth, death and hell, and devotion to Buddha (vīrya pāramitā) ; the abstraction of the mind from worldly affairs, to be centred in meditation (Dhyāna-pāramitā) ; and the conviction that all things are illusory, and Buddha alone is true (Pajñā pāramitā). These are followed by a story in which seven maidens obtained preeminence by devotion to Buddha. It forms the subject of a distinct work, (Sapta-kumārikā Avadānā), and will be noticed under that head. The means of salvation and the evils of mundane existence are then discarded upon, and they are followed by a long string of stories in illustration of various duties incumbent on house-holders and hermits, and of proper and improper conduct.

Prasenajit and Ajātaśatru were rival kings who long fought with each other for supremacy. Thrice had the former been defeated, but, a rich banker helping him with a thousand pieces of gold, on the fourth occasion he became successful. To evince his gratitude he placed the banker on the throne for seven days, during which the latter did a great deal to promote the spread of Bauddha religion.

A householder was a great reviler of the Baudha religion, but was converted by the sight of some miracles performed by Maudgalyāyana. He then worshipped Śākya with great devotion, and beheld the miracle of lights of various colours issuing from the mouth of the great Saint.

The person of a Brahman's wife, when en ciente, smelt most offensively. Astrologers declared the cause to be the presence of a Preta (an evil spirit) in her womb. She delivered an ugly brat whose body smelt like a putrid substance, and who was fond of feasting on aquatic weeds unfit for human food, whence his name Durgandha Jambāla. After roaming about in many places, Jambāla sought the shelter of Bhagavān when he sojourned at Kuṭāgāra near the Karkaṭa tank, in the suburbs of Vaiśali. The Lord converted him, and, when asked by his followers the cause of the fœtid odour, said, that it was due to his having, in a former life, abused a Yati.

Once when Prasenajit, king of Śrāvastī, was retiring from Jetavana, after adoring Bhagavān, five hundred geese came to him, and announced that the king of Pāñchāla had been greatly pleased to notice Prasenajit's devotion, and was coming to congratulate him on his conversion to the true faith. Prasenajit let loose the geese in the tank near the monastery, and retired. The geese, hearing the discourses of Bhagavān, were released from their anserine form, whereupon they repaired to the highest heaven. Bhagavān explains that the geese were Brāhman Buddhists who, hearing the evil teaching of some Tirthikas, had wavered in their belief, and were therefore punished by being doomed to be born as geese. From the genealogical table above given it will be seen that Prasenajit was the 9th from Bimbisāra, a contemporary of Śākya, and could not have been a contemporary of the great teacher ; but such anachronisms are frequent in the Avadānas. The Tīrthikās appear to have been Jains ; some say they are Brāhmanas.

A youth of the name of Veditajasā of the Śākya race, solicited Bhagavān, when he was at Kapila Āśrama, to make him a monk. The lord declined, because he was a youth, and had not obtained his father's sanction. Sanction was, after some difficulty, obtained and he was ordained. His claim to the distinction was, that he had, in a former life, replaced a flag which had been knocked down by some wrestlers whom he overcame in fight.

King Prasenajit had a very ugly daughter, by name Kutsitā, whom he gave away to one Gaṅga. The husband, ashamed of his bargain, and apprehensive of ridicule from his relations, kept her confined in a room. The relatives wished much to see her, and once proposed that at a festive assembly whoever would come without his wife would be fined five hundred pieces of coin. Every one came to the assembly with his wife, except Gaṅga, who paid the fine. Kutsitā heard of this, and, to relieve her husband of the trouble she caused him, repaired to a jungle to commit suicide. Just after applying the noose round her neck she prayed to Buddha. Rays of light from the person of the Lord came to her rescue, and by their touch converted her into a handsome woman. Thus metamorphosed she returned home. In the mean time the relatives had plied Gaṅga with so much wine that he became insensible, and lay on the ground. Seizing this opportunity they went to the house of Gaṅga, and were surprised to behold the most handsome woman they had ever cast their eyes on. Returning to the place of feasting they congratulated Gaṅga on the possession of such a beauty. He took the remarks of his relatives to be mere banter, but, on return home, was himself surprised to behold the change. The lady soon after obtained her husband's permission to become a mendicant, and was duly ordained by the Lord. The cause of her ugliness is related to be her fault, committed during a former life, in having expelled from her home a Pratyeka Buddha named Virūpa, after insulting him for his ugliness.

A king of the Kaurava race, while reigning at Kāshṭhanagara, wished to be a hermit. The Lord refused to ordain him until he had obtained the permission of his wife and relatives. He did so, and was ordained. His good fortune was due to various acts of piety performed in former lives which are detailed at length.

When sojourning at Jētavana near Śrāvasti, Śākya Sinha once dwelt on the importance of giving presents to worthy persons, and, in illustration of this subject, said, that when, after many successful ventures and loaded with valuable commodities including sandal-wood of the kind called Gośirsha, a number of merchants were returning home from Rākshasa-dvīpa (island of genii), a violent hurricane arose, and every moment threatened them with destruction. Beholding this, some offered their prayers to Tirthikas, some to Chandra, some to Śakra, some to Agni, some to Varuṇa, and, so on, but to no avail. One of them, named Punyasena, prayed Hetūttama, a Bodhisattva who dwelt near his abode. Immediately the vessel was cast on shore, and the merchants returned home. Just at the time Hetūttama happened to be laid up with a burning fever, and his medical advisers recommended an unguent of Gośirsha to be smeared on his person. Knowing that the drug was to be had only from Punyasena, king Chandrāloka offered four lacs of coins for a supply of it. Punyasena declined the offer, but, carried the drug to the hermit, and cured his suffering with it. The result of this act of beneficence was, that the person of the merchant became most beautiful and redolent with exquisite aroma, and all the wealth he had lost at sea was found in the bottom of the well behind his house.

Bhaya Śarmā, a Brāhman of Śrāvasti, was one night about to go to his lady love, when his old mother stood in the way, and prevented him. He felt vexed and killed her ; but when he came to his mistress and told her of what he had done for her love, she was annoyed, and sent him away from her house as she would not associate with a matricide. Deeply mortified, he consulted certain Brāhmaṇas, and through their advice, performed all the expiatory ceremonies enjoined in the Vedas, but they failed to afford him consolation. At last he retired to the wilderness, and, by the advice of a Bhikshu, performed the rite called aṣṭāṅga upasādha, (the cleansing of the eight members of the body,) and, then going to the Lord at Jētavana, got himself ordained a hermit, and obtained peace of mind.

Madhurasvara, a householder, had left some wealth with misers. The wealth, so deposited, was all destroyed by fire. The householder taught the misers the true religion, and they got their wealth back. Some robbers next attempted to rob them, and he saved them. He then became a prisoner in lieu of some mendicants, and remained tied hand and foot in a field. Some robbers came to kill him ; but Bhairavī Devī, with a retinue of five hundred imps, came to his rescue ; his bonds fell off, and he rose high up in the sky like a flamingo, whereupon the robbers fled, and he became a devoted hermit.

One Padmaka, beholding, in his youth, a dead body, felt disgusted with the world, and, obtaining the permission of his parents, became a hermit. When at Mathurā, he entered the house of a prostitute for alms. The frail one was charmed with the beauty of his person, and sought his love. He was disgusted, and immediately left her house. To overcome him she employed a Chandālī, who lighted a fire and by the force of her enchantments brought him thither ; but, rather than yield to the wishes of the two wicked women, he offered to jump into the blazing fire, and kill himself. His enticers were terrified, and at last took his advice, and became mendicants.

The Lord Jina was once in the Nandana garden of Indra, and there, amidst the gods, performed many miracles for their edification. He performed the meditation (samādhi) called Durgati-sodhana, and instantly millions of rays of diverse colours issued from his body, and blessed the gods. He then performed the Rajādhishthāna meditation, and similar rays issued from his turban, purified all classes of beings, and returned back to their place. Then issued from his person the Hrit mantra, and the sound of it at once translated the dwellers of hell to heaven. Then from his turban issued the sound of Guhya mantra, and it excited in all created beings a desire to adore the three Ratnas. Similarly the Mumindrahrit mantra issued therefrom and excited in all creation a desire to adopt the Bodhi religion. Then the Sarvajinopahrit mantra issued forth in great effulgence, and wrought salvation for all the greatest sinners ; thereupon bright lights issued from the head of all the saints, and the Lord closed his instruction by explaining the secret knowledge of the great Dhāraṇī.

In Mr. Beal's Tripit'haka three works are mentioned as bearing on the life of Aśoka ; the first is A-yu-wang-pi-u-king, which is the same with the Aśoka Avadāna. The name of its translator is lost. The second is A-yu-wang-chun or a history of Aśoka rājā ; it was "translated by Ngan-fa-kin of the Western Tsin dynasty (circ. 265-313), belonging to the Ngan-sih (Assika Parthian country). The third is named A-yu-wang-wan-muh-yun-in, and refers to the circumstances which induced Aśka to put out the eyes of his son.

A collection of stories in illustration of miracles performed by Buddha. Compiled by Nandīśvara Āchārya. According to the name of the work there should be a hundred tales, but the codex under notice contains only ninety. The stories are puerile and of little interest. They open and conclude in very much the same way in every case, and repetitions are frequent. The language is simple, and of the peculiar verbose style common in Nepalese Sanskrit works. Nothing is known of the author ; but the work is of considerable antiquity. It appears to be the same with the Pih-u-king of the Chinese, which was translated from the Sanskrit by one Guṇabhadra. The Sanskrit name of the Chinese work as given by Mr. Beal is Śatāvadāna Sūtra, (Catalogue of the Buddhist Tripīṭhaka, p. 88). The following are brief abstracts of the stories.

STORY I.—Once upon a time, the great Buddha lodged in the Bamboo grove (Venu-vana) on the side of the Kalandaka tank at Rājagriha. There, he initiated Rājā Bimbisāra into his doctrines, and, by preaching, converted thousands to his faith. There lived, at this time, in a retired village named Dakṣiṇagiri, one Sampūrṇa, a Brāhman as rich as Kuvera. Some of his relatives embraced the Buddhist religion, and spoke highly of it before him. One day he fell on his knees and adored Buddha. The Lord appeared before his votary attended by Ānanda. Sampūrṇa received him with every manifestation of reverence due to a god, and waited the pleasure of the Lord. Of him the Lord sought food and drink, both for self and his retinue of Bhikshus. When a thousand begging vessels were filled with all the dainties of the time, a voice from heaven declared "the vessels of a thousand Bhikshus are full."

At the manifestation of this miraculous voice, Sampūrṇa fell, like a felled tree, at the feet of the Lord, and importuned him for instruction in Bodhi knowledge. The Lord lent a willing ear to his importunities, and, calling to mind the doings and sufferings of his votaries in his former existences, smiled. Rays, blue, red, yellow and white, shot forth from his smiling lips. Some of these proceeded upwards and some downwards ; the latter cooled the fiery regions of hell and warmed the chill blush of Stigian wind, liberating multitudes of suffering sinners, who repaired to the regions of the gods and of men, and there took new births. Those rays which preceded upwards, reached the regions of Brahmā and others, and there recited the two following Gāthās :—

"Commence the good work, give up the world, and be obedient to the command of Buddha."

These rays afterwards turned thrice round Buddha, and disappeared in his head-dress. When Buddha had a mind to reveal the past, these rays, issuing from his teeth, disappeared in his back ; when he wished to speak of the future they vanished in his front ; when he thought to speak of hell they fell at his feet ; and when of perfect knowledge they lost themselves in his head-dress.

After the disappearance of these rays the Lord addressed Ānanda, saying, "this Brāhman is sure to become a great Buddha, endowed with mercy, memory, the three qualities, and the ten powers, observant of the six articles of our faith and adorned by universal benevolence." The Lord then taught Sampūrṇa the perfect knowledge.

II.—When dwelling in a lofty tower on the lake Markala, in the vicinity of Vaishali, the Lord, while on a begging excursion, entered the house of one Siṅha, a general of the royal army, who offered him welcome. The brilliancy of the Lord's person attracted take notice of Yasomatī, daughter-in-law of Siṅha. She enquired of her father-in-law how she could be as brilliant. He replied, by becoming a votary of the Lord.

Thereupon she invited Buddha and his companions, satisfied them with various dainty dishes, and adored the Lord by throwing flowers at his feet. These flowers forthwith went to the lofty tower and formed a gemmed parasol of such exquisite beauty as even the most skilled artist would fail to imitate. She fell at the feet of the Lord, and prayed for admission to the ranks of his followers. The Lord addressed Ānanda, saying, "this Yasomati is destined to become a great Buddha, Ratnamati by name."

III.—When the Lord sojourned in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada in the Jeta grove at Śrāvastī, there lived at Śrāvastī a rich usurer who had obtained a son by worshipping Indra and other gods. The son, named Ānanda, grew up under the care of his parents. But he was weak in the loins, and even at the age of six years could not walk, though by his sharpness and intelligence he readily, at the time, mastered all the sciences of his day. The usurer was very sorry at the ailment of his son, and wept bitterly for his sad lot.

The omniscient Lord, knowing all this, presented himself one day at the usurer's house. The boy, seeing him marked with all the 32 signs of greatness, suddenly rose up from his seat, received him with great reverence, and enquired about his health. The parents of the child wondered at this miraculous cure.

The Lord smiled and said, "this boy will become a great Buddha."

IV.—A merchant at Śrāvastī carried his mercantile transactions beyond the sea. In two successive voyages his vessels were wrecked. He escaped with his life with great difficulty, his splendid fortune being drowned in the sea.

He started on a third expedition with the firm conviction that the Lord Buddha was the greatest and most merciful of gods. This time fortune smiled on him; after a prosperous voyage he returned laden with riches from the Jewel Island. After his return he bought two Kārshāpaṇa worth of incense, and at the Jeta grove burnt it before the Lord. The smoke rose up in clouds and covered the sun. The astonished merchant invited Buddha and all his Bhikshus, feasted them to their fill, and showered precious stones with a lavish hand among them. These stones rose up in the air, and there formed a splendid tower and a brilliant gemmed umbrella over the Lord's head. The merchant fell on his knees and asked instruction in supreme knowledge.

The Lord said to Ānanda, "this man will become a perfect Buddha, Ratnottama by name."

V.—In Śrāvastī there was a patriarch as rich as Kuvera. When Devaputra fell from heaven he, under the name of Chaṇḍika, became the son of that patriarch. Chaṇḍika for a long time suffered from a burning sensation throughout his body. Obtaining no relief from medicines, he meditated on Buddha. The Lord kindly presented himself before Chaṇḍika, and granted him a medicine obtained from Indra. It effected an instant cure. Chaṇḍika feasted Buddha to his entire satisfaction and asked instruction in supreme knowledge.

The Lord said to Ananda &c.

VI.—Before the advent of Buddha Rājā Prasenajit used to worship the Tirthikas, but, after the appearance of that great preacher, he bowed to none, but the great Lord. When the Lord was dwelling in the Jeta grove, a gardener of Śrāvastī brought a big lotus flower as a present for the king.

A worshipper of the Tirthikas asked its price. At this time Anāthapiṇḍada came and doubled its value. They bade against each other with emulous pride till the price rose to a hundred-fold. Thereupon the gardener enquired about the whereabouts of Buddha, and, hearing of his great power from Anāthapiṇḍada, presented the flower to the Lord. Instantly the lotus swelled out to the size of a carriage wheel, and stood over Buddha's head. The gardener, astonished at this, asked instruction in supreme knowledge. The Lord said to Ānanda, "this man is to become a great Buddha Padmodbhava by name."

VII.—When the Lord was dwelling in the Jeta grove, the kings of North and South Kośhala made war upon each other. Rājā Prasenajit came with a sorrowful countenance to the Lord, and begged him to bring about a peace. Whereupon the Lord proceeded to Benares where the king of North Kośhala paid him a visit. Buddha preached before him the blessings of peace. His lecture had the desired effect. The king repented, and went to a monastery where he rose to the rank of an Arhat.

At the request of the Southern king Buddha lived for three months in his capital. The king bestowed on him the gift of a thousand pieces of cloth, and asked instruction in perfect knowledge.

The Lord said to Ānanda, "the king will become a perfect Buddha under the name Vijais for this good work."

VIII.—When the Lord resided in the Jeta grove, two bankers of Śrāvastī quarrelled with each other. One was a Buddhist, the other a follower of a Tirthika named Pūraṇa. Each held his object of worship to be the most powerful. The king Prasenajit convened a large assembly to settle their quarrel, and requested the disputants to worship each his own god. The flowers offered to Pūraṇa fell to the ground, while those offered to Buddha flew like so many flamingoes (haṇsa) towards the Jeta grove. The worshipper of Pūraṇa, astonished at his great mistake, deserted the altar of his god and falling on his knees, asked &c.

IX.—The ninth miracle is wanting.

X.—Once upon a time Ajātaśatru defeated Rājā Prasenajit in a great battle. The vanquished monarch, overwhelmed with grief at this sad reverse of his fortune, shut himself up in one of the innermost apartments of his seraglio. On this, a rich banker of Śrāvastī incited the king to go again to war by offering him a large heap of gold. In this second battle Ajātaśatru was made a captive. Prasenajit went in triumph to the Jeta grove where the Lord was residing, carrying the captive in his train. There, before the Lord, he generously set the vanquished king at liberty.

Prasenajit did not forget the banker. He offered the man his throne for a week. During this week the banker-king had no other occupation but honoring the Lord and feasting his Bhikshus. At the expiration of his short reign, he fell at the feet of the Lord, and asked for supreme felicity.

The Lord addressed to Ānanda, saying, "this man will obtain his desired object. He will become a Buddha, Avayapada by name."

XI.—The Lord was residing in a hamlet down the stream Ajera-vatī, in Śrāvastī. The inhabitants of that place were all boatmen. They cheerfully entertained the Lord with a share of their frugal fair, and sat round him in a retired spot, listening to him with great attention. From him the boatmen obtained each his desire.

The Lord revealed the secret of his great miraculous power to those Bhikshus who were desirous of knowing it in the following words :—

"Once on a time a Buddha, Bhagiratha by name, reached the banks of the Ganges with two thousand Bhikshus, on a travel round the country. A merchant, who was ferrying his goods over the stream with a number of his dependents, approached the Lord respectfully, helped him in crossing over the stream, and feasted him to his entire satisfaction. I am that merchant. I enjoy the supreme felicity by the virtue of my good works in my former existences."

XII.—Perambulating in the Kaurava country, the Lord one day reached its capital. There he summoned Indra and bestowed on him a quantity of sandal-wood from Gośirsha. A few days later Indra, expecting favours from the Lord, anointed him with the sandal, and feasted him with rich viands. Wondering at the submission of the gods, thousands of the Kaurava race flocked round him to receive his blessing. By his precepts every one obtained what he desired.

The Lord addressed the Bikshus who desired to know the secret of his power, saying :—

"A great Buddha, Brahma by name, entered once the capital of a Kshatriya king, who prayed the Lord for staying there for a period of three months. During this short time, the king honored the Lord in every possible way. He offered him flower, aromatics, incense, rich food, splendid robes and the sandal from Gośirsha.

"O Bhikshus ! I am that king ; by virtue of my former good works I obtain this pūjā from the gods."

XIII.—While the Lord was living in the Jeta grove a caravan of five hundred merchants missed their way in a sandy desert, and suffered greatly from the scorching heat of the meridian sun. Every moment their sufferings grew more and more intense. They prayed Varuṇa and others, but from none did they receive the least help. They then sought protection from Buddha. The Lord Buddha left the Jeta grove, and appeared before them. They welcomed him with ardent manifestations of respect. By the command of Buddha, Indra sent refreshing showers down, and fresh and delightful breeze blew from the south. The merchants, relieved of their sufferings, went to Śrāvastī. There they obtained all they desired through the blessing of the Lord.

The Lord addressed the Bhikshus, saying ; "In ancient days Chandana, a great Buddha, went to the capital of a king. The king prevailed upon the Lord by his entreaty to honor his capital with a temporary residence for three months. There was no rain for several years in the kingdom ; the ministers advised the king to bathe the Lord with perfumed water. The Lord was delighted, and forthwith heavy showers of rain fell from the clouds. I made one of those that poured the perfumed water over the Lord's head."

XIV.—Once on a time the city of Nāthakaṇṭha was desolated by a destructive epidemic. The suffering multitude prayed Indra and other gods for help, but to no effect. They then sought protection from Buddha. He appeared among them from his then residence in the Bamboo grove (Venu-vana) in Rājagriha and granted them relief. The Brāhmaṇas of the place, grateful for the kindness of the Lord, listened to his preaching with great attention. They obtained all their desires through his lectures.

The Lord revealed to the Bhikshus the real cause of his great power. He said, "Chandana, a great Buddha, entered of yore the capital of a Kshatriya king. The king honored him greatly. I was that king ; my great power resulted from that great man's blessing."

XV.—The Lord lodged in the Bamboo grove on the side of the tank Kalandaka. Ajātaśatru, the king of that place, was a great hater of the Buddhists. He made preparations for an extensive sacrifice. Brāhmans came to the sacrifice by thousands, but none to the Bamboo grove.

When the priests offered the oblation to Indra, the Lord, disguised in the form of that god, accepted it from them. People wondered at the visible appearance of the god, and came flocking to the sacred spot. To the great astonishment of the assembled multitude the Lord assumed his own form. Many turned Buddhist at this miracle and obtained whatever they desired from the great Lord.

The Lord revealed to the Bhikhus the following ancient story "A Kshatriya king founded a splendid Vihāra at the desire of Indra. dyumna, a great Buddha. I was that Kshatriya king who was blessed by Indradyumna."

XVI.—Ajātaśatru and Devadatta, two great enemies of the Buddhist faith, published a hostile criticism on the sacred books of that religion. Thereupon Indra visited the Lord, and himself superintended the decoration of the Bamboo grove, which rivalled Vajjayanta. At this the people went in crowds to receive blessings from the Lord, in spite of royal prohibition. The king was at last obliged to revoke his decree against the Lord's worship.

XVII.—There were five hundred musicians at Śrāvasti. The king had a great taste for music. Supriya, a master musician, applied one day for permission to play on the Vīna before him. The king took Supriya to Jetavana. Supriya's performance was quite charming.

But the Lord had, before this, from prescience of Supriya's design, invited Panchaśikha, the prince of heavenly choristers. Panchaśikha now played on a Vina the staff of which was set with gems and rubies. Every one was ravished. Supriya and his tuneful band, knowing the evanescent character of all worldly excellence, invited the Lord to a sumptuous feast, and solicited Bodhi knowledge. The Lord smiled, and said to Ananda ; "these musicians will become Buddhas Varṇaśvaras by name." Then he addressed the Bhikshus, saying, "this my great power is owing to my merit in feasting and delighting Prabodha, a great Buddha."

XVIII.—When the Lord was at Śrāvastī an adulterer was led to the place of execution by an order from the king. Having fortunately met the Lord on the way, the convict prayed him for his own life. The Lord sent Ānanda to procure a reprieve from the king on the score of the convict's betaking himself to a monastery. As a monk the adulterer soon became celebrated for his piety and devotion.

The Lord said to the Bhikshus :—"In one of my former existences I was a Brāhmaṇa, Padaśata by name. I gave Lord Indradhvaja an excellent dinner at that time. From him I got this my present power."

XIX.—When the Lord sojourned in the Bamboo grove, Bimbiśāra, the king of Magadha, approached him reverentially with drums beating and symbols sounding, led him in a pompous procession to the capital, and feasted him magnificently.

The Lord said to the Bhikshus that in one of his former existences he, as a king, had honored Buddha Kshemankara in a similar way.

XX.—A rich banker in Śrāvastī was converted to Buddhism by Maudgalyāyana. He gratified the Lord by inviting him to a dinner of a hundred dishes of delicious viands, and prayed for Bodhi knowledge. The Lord smiled, variously coloured rays of light issued from his teeth as described in miracle I. The Lord said to Ānanda, "this banker will become a great Buddha, Divyananda by name."

XXI.—Travelling in Magadha the Lord stood one day on the banks of the Ganges. The Bhikshus beheld a large stupa at a little distance, and enquired to whose honor it had been raised. The Lord replied : "Brahmadatta was the king of Benares in ancient times. Being childless he worshipped many gods. Once he found in his garden tank a boy marked with all the 32 signs of greatness, born in a lotus and seated on its seed vessel. He picked the boy up, and had him educated as his own son. At every step the boy took, lotus flowers issued from his feet and instantly withered and decayed. Kāśyapa instructed him in divine knowledge. He left the world, and, becoming a hermit, obtained supreme felicity.

XXII.—As the Lord was passing one day through a street of Śrāvastī, a boy fetched a full-bloom lotus from a gardener in the bazar, and threw it upon the Lord's head. The Lord smiled and said, "For this deed of merit this boy will become a great Buddha, Padmottara by name."

XXIII.—The wife of a sea-faring merchant vowed that she would, on the safe and speedy return of her husband, present to the shrine of Viṣṇu, a golden wheel. On his arrival, true to her vow, she proceeded straight to the temple, but met the Lord Buddha in the midway. Observing him marked with all the 32 signs of greatness, she offered the wheel to him. The Lord smiled and said, On her attainment to the Bodhi knowledge, she will become a great Buddha, named Chakrāntara.

XXIV.—On arriving before a large stupa, the Bhikshus in his retinue enquired of the Lord, to whom was the old stūpa dedicated ? The Lord replied, to Daśaśiras. The gardener of a king named Brāhma-datta found a little urchin one day on a lotus flower, and presented it to the king. The king named him Daśaśiras. On arriving to majority, he left the king, and became a hermit. As fire expires when fuel is consumed, so he obtained utter annihilation.

The Bhikshus enquired about the merits of Daśaśiras. The Lord replied that in one of his former existences Daśaśiras threw a lotus flower on Buddha Vipāśhit. From that Lord he obtained a boon, dis severing the bond of transmigration.

XXV.—A rich merchant of Śrāvastī, considering the evanescent character of all wordly happiness, determined to buy the goodwill of the Lord at the sacrifice of everything else. The Lord prophesied that the merchant would become a great Buddha, Sūkshmatvak by name.

XXVI.—The next merchant who obtained the Lord's favor was prophesied to obtain the name of Sitaprabha on his attaining nirvāṇa.

XXVII.—The boatman who ferried the Lord across the Ganges in one of his numerous travels in Magadha was blessed to have the name Samsārottaraṇa when he should attain supreme felicity by the teaching of the Lord.

XXVIII.—A girl one day decked the Lord's feet with red sandal-wood paste. When he went on his begging tour, the whole city of Śrāvastī was reddened with the paste. At this marvellous display of the Lord's power, the girl, on her knees, prayed for Bodhi knowledge, which the Lord granted her. She became a great lord, named Dharmā-dāna.

XXIX.—A gardener presented the Lord at Śrāvastī with a pilgrim's staff. The Lord took it, and planted it in the earth. Forthwith it swelled to the size of a big banian tree, covered all over with beautiful green foliage. At this miraculous power of the Lord, the gardener, &c., &c. His name was to be Nirmala.

XXX.—A band of intoxicated revellers was dancing and singing in a street of Śrāvastī. The Lord presented himself among them. Their riotous indecent songs changed at once into hymns in praise of the Lord. They threw blue lotuses on his head. These flowers rose up in the air and there formed a rich parasol. At this marvellous display &c. They were each to be named Balgusvāna on attaining Bodhi knowledge.

XXXI.—At one time the Bhikshus suffered greatly from an epidemic of jaundice. They enquired of the Lord the cause of such suffering. The Lord said :—"The people of Benares laboured under this very same disease in the reign of Padmaka. The physicians, unable to relieve the jaundiced by the medicines they had, advised them to bring a Rohita fish of a particularly large size. But this fish was nowhere to be found. The king, who loved his subjects greatly, unable to behold their sufferings, vowed to give up his life. He abdicated the throne in favour of his son, leaped from the terrace of his palace, and died. On his death he became a big Rohita fish. By the use of its flesh, every one obtained a thorough cure. After this the Rohita fish addressed his subjects in the following way : "Come, O my people, I will teach you the excellent Bodhi knowledge, by which you will obtain nirvāṇa." They said 'You took for us so much pains, therefore when you become a Buddha we will become your disciples.' "

XXXII.—The Lord taught the doctrine that merit results from giving alms, and that a meritorious man can work miracles. He gave the following as an instance.

Once upon a time, the kingdom of one Brahmadatta being stricken by a severe famine, he numbered his people, weighed the grains in the country, and made it a rule that every one should get only one mouthful of food a day, only the king getting two. A Brāhmaṇ, who was not included in the census, demanded his portion. The king gave up half his share. Then Indra in the disguise of a Brāhman came to demand his share. The king, even at the risk of his life, gladly offered it to him. Indra greatly delighted, sent down a heavy shower of rain.

XXXIII.—Devadatta sent assassins to the Jetavana grove to kill the Lord. The Lord received the murderers very hospitably. The Bhikshus wondering at this, the Lord said :—"Bramhadatta, king of Benares, had by his queen Durmatī an only son Dharmapāla by name. Durmatī, full of anger, envy and malice vowed one day, "If I take anything in the king's household I shall drink my son's blood by cutting his throat." At the nonfulfilment of the vow, the king in wrath commanded her to keep her word. The child cried pitiously in the agony of death. But the cruel mother would not relent. I am that Dharmapāla, and this Devadatta is that Durmatī "

XXXIV.—A Bhikshu, who wanted to mend his nether garment, wept bitterly, not being able to thread the needle. He cried : "Who is there desirous of merit ?" The Lord said he wanted merit. The Bhikshu, wondering, said, "O wonderful ! wonderful ! the Lord, who is a great Buddha himself, still thirsts after merit." The Lord replied, there was a king, Sibi by name, who gave different parts of his body for the benefit of small animals. To Indra he gave his eyes. At this, Indra granted him the Bodhi knowledge.

XXXV.—A king of Benares had a Yaksha for his spiritual guide. The Yaksha demanded for his food the flesh of the king's son. After much lamentation the king submitted to his demand. The cruel Yaksha then wanted to devour the queen. She too was sacrificed for the gratification of the spiritual guide. Then the king had to offer his ownself a victim to the unappeasable appetite of the Yaksha. When the king had already promised his own body, the Yaksha taught him the following verse—"Grief is always caused by our dear ones ; we fear for their mishap. He who has none to love has none to fear or to grieve for." The king, in meek submission, said, "Do, Oh Lord, as you like with my body." But he was agreeably surprised to find the Yaksha transformed into Indra, who held the prince in one, and the queen in the other, hand, and restored them to the king.

O Bhikshus ! I am the king, Ānanda is the son, and Yaśodharā is the queen.

XXXVI.—Buddha, when preaching the doctrine of filial love and obedience, narrated the following story by way of illustration :

“When Maitrakanyaka was a mere child, his father, a rich merchant of Śrāvastī, went to sea and died by shipwreck. On arriving at majority Maitrakanyaka enquired of his mother about the profession of his father in order that he may betake to it. His mother, unwilling to tell the truth, lest she should lose her son too in the sea, deceived him by saying his father was a menial servant.

“Maitrakanyaka took to that profession, and earned four kārshāpaṇas. Next he turned a dealer in spices, and gained eight kārshāpaṇas. On the first day of his career as a gold merchant he obtained 16 kārshāpaṇas, on the second 32. All these earnings he made over to his mother. But on being apprised of the true profession of his father, he determined to start on a nautical expedition, and when his mother, with tears in her eyes, came to dissuade him from his purpose, he kicked her, and bid her be gone. At sea, a sea-monster (Makara) broke his vessel to pieces. He saved himself on a plank, and wandered in a state of utter destitution in the city of Ramanaka. He was, however, taken up and hospitably entertained by four Apsarasas, with whom he remained for several years. Then travelling southward he was met by a company of eight Apsarasas. By them he was whirled in a giddy round of pleasures for years together. Travelling again in the same direction he fell in with a band of sixteen Apsarasas, who also tried their best to make him happy. On the fourth time he was welcomed by a troop of thirty-two Apsarasas, who too spared no pains to make his joyous. These enjoyments he derived as a reward for having made over his earnings to his mother. But on the fifth time he happened to find himself in a city of iron. On entering it, a big burning iron wheel began to revolve over his head, from that time blood and pus became his only food. In this manner he remained there for sixty-nine thousand years. These pains were owing to his kicking and disobeying his mother. Then he determined to hold that iron wheel on his head for ever, that others may not suffer the same pains. Just at this charitable thought the wheel went up seven times the distance of the nether region and left him free.

“I am, O Bhikshus ! that Maitrakanyaka.”

XXXVII.—The Lord persuaded by his lectures the son of a rich banker to go to a hermitage, and lead a solitary life, unknown to the public. The Bhikshus enquired of the Lord the reason for this. The Lord said :—

In days of yore, there lived in a mountain-cave a sage with no other companion than a hare. The hare, coming to know, one day, that the sage was about to leave the place on account of a draught, requested him to postpone his departure till the next morning. The sage consented. The hare kindled a fire and was on the point of jumping into it, when he, out of love to the poor creature, promised to stay there even at the risk of his life. The hare, well-pleased, turned his eyes towards heaven, and prayed Indra for rain. Forthwith there was a heavy shower of rain. The sage asked the favor of becoming the hare's disciple, when it should attain the rank of a Buddha.

The Lord said, "I am that hare, and the banker's son is that sage."

XXXVIII.—The Lord made no distinction as to proper and improper times in preaching the truths of religion. One day he preached while cleansing the Jetavana with a broom in hand. The Bhikshus admired his unwearied labour in the cause of truth. The Lord said :—

"Subhāshitagaveshī, the son of Brahmadata, ascended the throne of Benares, and ordered his ministers to search for good news [subhāshita or gospel]. Indra, in the disguise of a Yaksha, brought him one. On the king's asking for a second, the false Yaksha made the king's falling or jumping into a fiery ditch heated by burning fire for seven days and nights, a condition of telling it. The king abdicated his throne in favour of his son, and, coming to the brink of the fiery lake, jumped into it. Forthwith it was filled with cold limpid water. Indra throwing off his disguise, taught him the following Gāthā :

"Walk in the path of duty ; do good to your brethren ; and work no evil unto them. He who confers a benefit upon a man, is lodged comfortably both here and in the next world."

"O Bhikshus, I am that Subhāshitagaveshī."

XXXIX.—One day the Lord entered the city of Śrāvastī with his alms-dish in hand. A Brāhmaṇ, approaching him, drew a circle round where he stood, and cried, "Gautama, you should not cross this line until you have counted down five hundred kārshāpaṇas to me", The Lord, seizing this opportunity to point out that good and evil deeds never go unrequited, obeyed the Brāhmaṇ. The news of this event went round the city. Many, even gods, offered their purses to the Lord's service ; but he accepted none. At last when Anāthapiṇḍada paid his ransom, he made no objection. The Bhikshus asked, if Anāthapiṇḍada owed the Brāhmaṇ the money just paid. The Lord said, "The eldest son of Brahmadatta went to his villa in the spring. There the minister's son played at dice with another, betting five hundred kārshāpaṇas. He lost the wager ; but did not pay the man as he ought to have done. I am the king's son, Anāthapīṇḍada, the minister's son, and this Brāhmaṇ is the winner at the play."

XL.—The Lord, while residing in the Gymnasium of Kūṣī, ordered Ānanda to raise a platform commencing from the north, saying, that was the day for his nirvāṇa. Subhadra, a traveller of Kūṣī, had obtained supreme felicity from the Lord's teaching. From Subhadra the athletes of the place obtained the religion of Buddha. While lying on that platform the Lord revealed to the Bhikshus the following story, showing his relation with Subhadra and the athletes of the place.

"A certain king tracked a herd of deer in a cave, and aimed at them. The lord of the herd jumped into an impetuous stream and ferried over on his back one by one the deer. He did not rest until all were on the other side, although in so doing he was scratched all over by the hoofs of his burden, and blood flowed copiously from his back. I am that lord of the herd, Subhadra one of the herd, and the athletes are the other members of the flock."

The Bhikshus then enquired about the merits of Subhadra which raised him to such an eminence. While Lord Kāśyapa was on his way to nirvāṇa, his nephew Aśoka was living at a great distance. Unable to see his dear uncle in his last moments, Aśoka gave vent to loud lamentation. A silvan deity, taking compassion on the boy, carried him to Kāśyapa by his power as a god. There both of them obtained valuable lectures from the Lord. The sylvan deity became an Arhat. Now he personates Subhadra.

XLI.—When the Lord was in the bamboo grove, Maudgalyāyana and Śāriputra, moved by the sight of the dreadful sufferings of a ghost enquired its cause from the Lord. The Lord said : "A consumptive, Buddha was advised by his physicians to use sugarcane juice. He entered the house of a rich banker of Śrāvastī, and begged of him for some of the juice. The banker ordered his servant to see the Lord supplied. The wicked servant half filled a vessel with urine, then poured a quantity of sugarcane juice into it, and presented it to the Lord. For that one misdeed, the servant suffers this torture."

XLII.—Maudgalyāyana enquired the cause of the terrible torture of a ghost, whom he saw convulsed with pain at the cremation ghat. The Lord said : "When the Lord Kāśyapa was at Benares, the wife of a house-holder was very ill-natured. A beggar one day asked alms of her. She bound him hand and foot to a prop, and gave him a good thrashing. She now suffers for her sins."

XLIII.—On another occasion the Lord gave the following account of the sufferings of a ghost.

When the Lord Kāśyapa was at Benares, a Bhikshu asked a palmful of water from a girl who was carrying a pitcher of water. She replied "Even if you die, Bhikshu, I won't grant you a drop." It is she who now suffers.

XLIV.—The history of another ghost who was at Gridhrakūṭa as given by the Lord is this—

Advised by physicians to take sweetmeats, a Buddha entered the house of a rich Brāhmaṇ. The Brāhmaṇ charged his wife with the entertainment of the lord. She gave him a dish of night-soil covered over with rice. She now feels the consequences of her wicked act.

XLV.—While the Lord was residing at Rājagriha, there were five hundred who hovered over the city in whirls. They fell in with Maudgalyāyana on his way to the city, and addressed him thus :—

"Know, holy man, we were five hundred bankers of Rājagriha. We gave no alms, we threw impediments in the ways of other's charity, and we accused innocent persons of holding communion with evil spirits. The result is, that we suffer infernal torture. We have our relatives in the city. Will you, holy man, request them to feed the lord Buddha for our sake. Thereby alone can we escape these torments." The relatives complied with their request. The Lord preached the transcendental doctrines of his faith, and the ghosts were ghosts no more.

XLVI.—The mother of Uttara, a shopkeeper of Śrāsvatī, was very miserly and ill-natured. After her death Uttara turned a hermit. The spectre of his mother appeared before him, and revealed to him her terrible sufferings. Uttara wept bitterly, for he loved his mother tenderly, feasted the Lord with rich viands and rescued his suffering mother.

XLVII.—Ānanda enquired one day the reason why a goblin, which he had seen, suffered so tremendously. The Lord said, "Lord Kāśyapa preached at Benares. Induced by his lecture a banker's daughter forsook the pleasures of the world. But her education was defective. She became conceited, she contemned the learned, and shut her eyes from the wise. For these three reasons, she became a hobgoblin ; bad smell issued from her body, and she lost the use of her eyes."

XLVIII.—A banker of Śrāvastī, though a follower of the Lord, died very conceited owing to the defect of his training. When the Bhikshus disposed of his dead body, they found him transformed into a goblin. They requested the Lord to preach for the benefit of the conceited ghost. The banker ghost, by training his mind, rose to the chiefship of the spirits. In this form he still used to come to listen to the Lord's edifying speeches. He obtained great power ; the odour of his body rose superior to that of all flowers.

XLIX.—Here is the reason of another ghost's terrible suffering as given by the Lord.

A banker had two wives. They were jealous of each other. One of them was in the family-way, the other contrived to mix a quantity of noxious drugs with the food of her rival. The miscarriage, as designed, took place. The guilty wife then swore before her relatives, "If I have had any hand in this foul deed, let god turn me to a ghost that eats her own son." She has now been turned to a suffering spirit.

L.—The miracle of Jambāla, vide p. 12.

LI.—A rich banker of Śrāvastī was very miserly. He heaped his gold in his garden where he lived. After his death, a black serpent, at whose very sight men lost their lives, took possession of the heap. Bimbisāra, the king, knowing this, solicited the Lord for the discipline of the serpent. The Lord preached before the serpent and converted him. He became a Devaputra.

LII.—A Brāhmaṇ's son, Chandra by name, lived close to the premises of Anāthpiṇḍada, with whom he often went to hear the Lord preach. Dying a premature death, he became a Devaputra. One day the Devaputra found a Brāhmaṇ in the cremation ghat bewailing the loss of an only child who still lay lifeless in his lap. In the disguise of a Rishi the Devaputra consoled the mourning father, and induced him to receive the lessons of fortitude from Buddha. By him he was initiated to the true faith. This Brāhmaṇ was the adulterer of Benares (p. 14). Chandra was his son. The adulterer's son saved his father's life when he was sentenced to death as a thief by sacrificing his own life.

LIII.—A banker's daughter covered the Lord, when entering the city to receive alms with three sāl flowers. Then she climbed up a tree for more of them. She fell down dead, and was instantly transformed into a Devaputrī. She listened to the Lord's preachings and, "tearing the mountain of this existing body with the adamantine weapon of knowledge, obtained the fruit of being furnished with ears."

LIV.—Rājā Bimbisāra, receiving the knowledge of truth from the Lord, had built a big stūpa over the Lord's nails and hairs in his zenana, and his maids cleansed the place every day. When Ajātaśatru obtained the throne by parricide, he prohibited the females to sweep the stūpa on pain of death. Śrīmatī, a female slave, caring not at all for her life, washed it neatly and lighted it with a row of lamps. The king, in great rage, ordered her to the place of execution. After her death, she, as a Devaputrī, appeared before the Lord in the Bamboo Grove, and, "cleaving the mountain of human misery by the thunderbolt of knowledge," obtained all that is desirable.

LV.—Anāthapiṇḍada obtained permission from the king to solicit alms for the Lord, for the benefit of the whole population of the city. On an elephant rode the patriarch, receiving metallic vessels, bracelets and other ornaments as alms from his neighbours. A poor woman, who had an only cloth, threw it over the elephant from behind a hedge. The beggar knew instantly what the matter was, and bestowed on her rich presents. She went to the Lord and received the knowledge of truth from him.

LVI.—When Buddha was putting up at Śrāvastī, Rājā Bimbisāra of Rājagriha grew impatient at his absence. The omniscient Lord, perceiving this, started for Rājagriha at once. But he was detained for one night by the entreaties of a parrot in a forest. Apprized of the Lord's residence in the wood by the intelligence furnished by the parrot, Bimbisāra, followed by the whole court, came out to receive him. Every one was highly delighted by the Lord's lectures. The parrot, fixing his mind on the Lord, died and turned a Devaputra. From heaven he regularly attended the Lord's teaching, and thus "cleaving the bond of human misery by the sharp knife of knowledge," obtained the highest bliss.

LVII.—While the Lord was at Rājagriha, Anāthapiṇḍada requested the king Bimbisāra to send an ambassador to the Lord, inviting him to Śrāvastī. He preached at that city. The messenger fixing his mind &c.

LVIII.—Journeying through different countries, the Lord entered a piece of forest where dwelt five hundred herds of buffaloes. A wicked animal ran at the Lord. To avoid the danger he created five lions. The buffalo fell submissively at the Lord's feet. The Lord took pity on the poor creature, taught him the sublime truths of the Buddhist faith. All impressions, he said, are transient, the soul has no attributes, the peace is nirvāṇa. The buffalo became a Devaputra, &c.

LIX.—Devaputra Upaṇshada obtained the fruit of being furnished with ears by constantly attending the Lord in the Jetavana grove with five hundred of his men.

The Lord gave the following story to his Bhikshus, pointing out the merits of the fortunate god. In this very Kalpa Kāśyapa Buddha lived at Benares. Rājā Krika, in a splendid procession, proceeded to pay a visit to the Lord. The Brāhmaṇs, burning with the ambition of becoming as great as Krika, asked the Lord to point out to them a way by which they could obtain all they desired. The Lord said, "By the holy fast called Aṣṭāṅga." They kept the fast. One was successful, he was born the son of Krika. Another, failing, became a serpent. Hot sand fell incessantly on his body and tortured him greatly. He again kept the fast, and was this time more happy in the result. His next existence was as the son of a god. This Upaṇshada was the serpent.

LX.—Haṁsajātaka, miracle, given in the Bodhisattva Avadāna.

LXI.—Suvarṇābha, or the golden-coloured, the son of a rich Śākya, frequented the pipul-tree grove. In pursuance of the Lord's teaching he betook himself to a hermitage and attained the rank of an Arhat. The Lord said, in the ninety-first mundane period a Buddha, Vihaśyī by name, lodged in the capital of Bandhumat. After he attained nirvāṇa the Rājā raised a stūpa to his honor. A householder, finding a golden coloured image in the stūpa, ornamented it with earrings, and prayed for having a Buddha for his preceptor, and becoming as beautiful as the golden image itself has that householder been born as Suvarṇābha.

LXII to LXXI.—All relate to men who attained Arhatships for their merit in ornamenting, clearing, and repairing the stūpa dedicated to the sage Vipasyi at the city of Bandhumatī.

LXXII.—A citizen of Śrāvastī had a daughter, Supriyā by name; she was Jatismarā, or one who remembered the history of her past existences. She chanted gāthās as soon as she was born. In her time the country was stricken by a famine, but she feasted the Lord and the legion of his Bhikshus with food procured by the power of working miracles. By the persuasion of the Lord she turned a hermit, and became an Arhat.

The Lord said, "In this very Bhadrāku Kalpa she was the maid-servant of a rich banker. Lord Kāśyapa was then at Benares. The banker, her master, went with a full supply of provision to his country-seat; from his store she bestowed a large quantity on the Lord and was approved by the banker. Her fortune in this existence she owes to her good deeds in her past."

LXXIII.—Śuklā was the only daughter of a rich Śākya at Kapilavastu. Many a prince sought the hand of the rich and beautiful heiress. Unwilling to marry she obtained her father's permission to betake herself to a hermit's life. She gradually rose to be an Arhat.

The Lord said, Śuklā in her former existence in this very Kalpa, entered Pravrajyā at the instance of Kāśyapa.

LXXIV.—Somā, the daughter of a rich Brāhmaṇ at Śrāvastī could remember all she heard. Having become a hermit, she rose to be an Arhat. Her history was that in her former existence she forsook the world at the command of Kāśyapa.

LXXV.—On the day of Girivalgu-Saṅgama, a festival held at Śrāvastī, people crowded from all quarters to the city. Among others came Kubalayā, a nāṭh girl, from the Dakṣiṇāpatha. She asked if there was any in the city that could surpass her in beauty. Being replied "Gautama, a Śramaṇa," she instantly repaired to the Jetavana, and there displayed her charms before the Lord. But by a miracle the Lord destroyed all her beauty, and turned her into a hideous old hag. She fell at the Lord's feet, and he gave her true knowledge.

The Lord said, Kaśisundara, the son of a Benares king, practised austerities in a secluded grove on the Himalaya. A Kumar girl fell in love with him, and endeavoured to seduce him by her charms. Finding him proof against her fascination, and mortified at the neglect of one she loved, she became a disciple of the great Kāśyapa. That Kumar girl is this Kubalayā.

LXXVI.—The daughter of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, refused to give her hand to any in the crowd of princes that paid their court to her. At last when Lord Kāśyapa came to live in the Rishipaṭṭana, she sought and obtained instruction in the Bodhi knowledge from him.

Some of her lovers wanted to carry her off by force. But she rose to the sky, and there displayed such miraculous power, that they all despaired of her hand, and went away.

The Lord said, Kāśisundarī obtained her powers by an intimate attachment with Kaṇaka who flourished in this very Kalpa.

LXXVII.—Muktāmālā of Śrāvastī was so named from the row of pearls with which she was born. She attained Arhatship by attending the Lord in company with a daughter-in-law of Anāthapiṇḍada.

The Lord said, a banker presented his wife with a pearl necklace. The wife gave it to Kāśyapa, who was sojourning in Mrigadāva at Rishipattana in Benares. For that merit she was born with a row of pearls on her neck.

LXXVIII.—The Lord was at Kachangalā. An old woman, hearing from Ānanda that the Lord was thirsty, approached him with a pitcher full of water. At the sight of the Lord her breast heaved and gushed and she felt the affections of a mother. The Lord said, "This kind woman was his mother in five hundred of his former existences. In one of her former existences she mastered all the mysteries of dhyāna, acquired the knowledge of proper and improper application thereof, and rose to the rank of a female Arhat."

LXXIX.—While the Lord was at Śrāvastī, Prasenajit and Brahmadaṭṭa quarrelled with each other. During the progress of the war, Prasenajit begat a daughter, and Brahmadaṭṭa a son. They adjusted their differences on condition of their children's marriage with each other. Arriving at age Kshemā, the girl expressed her desire of remaining a virgin and devoted to the Lord. Her father, alarmed, wrote to Brahmadaṭṭa to hasten the marriage. But Kshemā fled to the Lord for protection. He examined her carefully, and, instilling into her the knowledge of truth, raised her above the influence of vile passions. When the priest was just going to unite the young couple, Kshemā rose up to the sky where she displayed miracles. She came down thence, and with the permission of her father betook to hermitage. The Lord said, Kshemā in this very Bhadraka Kalpa delighted Lord Kāśyapa and obtained the boon of becoming the first among female disciples.

LXXX.—Virūpāvadānam. Given in the Bodhisattva Avadāna.

LXXXI.—Samudrāvadānam. Ditto.

LXXXII.—A householder of Śrāvastī had the mortification of finding all his children die as soon as they were born. He feasted the Lord one day, and promised if his next child lived to devote him to the Lord's service. His next born was a long-lived one. The householder kept his word. Sumana, the boy, soon attained Arhatship under the edifying lectures of the benign Buddha.

The Lord said, the high position of Sumana is due to his merit in feasting the Lord Vipāśyī, and in decorating the stūpa raised over his tooth and nails.

LXXXIII.—For granting two dinars at the stūpa of Vipāśyī the donor, Hirāṇypāṇi a gambler, was born at Śrāvastī, with two dinars always in hand ; when the coins were removed they were instantly replaced by others. He frequented the Lord's dwelling, and easily attained the high position of an Arhat.

LXXXIV.—When the Lord was at Śrāvastī the queen of Prasenajit gave birth to a son clad in the ochre vestment of an Arhat. No sooner was he born than he enquired whether the Lord was in that city. At the tender age of seven he was raised to the dignity of an Arhat.

The Lord said, When the son of Kṛika (vide supra LIX) wanted the permission of his parents to enter a hermitage, they made him promise his return after he had finished the study of the 'three receptacles.' He came back and taught his parents. He obtained Arhatship which he so richly merited.

LXXXV.—A pair of Yaśomitra's teeth oozed out continuous streams of water. By frequenting the Jetavana he obtained Arhatship.

The Lord said, in one of his former existences Yaśomitra, after entering the hermitage, supplied an old Bhikshu and his followers with water for a thousand years. The boon which he secured made him what he was now.

LXXXVI.—Just as the Lord landed at Śankāśya, Upapādika, a Bhikshu, received him with great honor. The Bhikshu was admitted into the rank of Arhats.

The Lord gave the following account of his merits—Five Bhikshus obtained true knowledge from Vipāśyī. One of them is this Upapādika.

LXXXVII.—Sobhita, the son of a rich Śākya at Kapilavastu, betaking himself to the hermitage, obtained Arhatship.

The Lord said, "In Bhadraka Kalpa, Rājā Sobhita erected a stūpa over the hair and nails of Krakachchhanda in his own capital, Sobhavatī. On a festive occasion a brotherhood of friends proceeded to strew flowers on the stūpa. Sobhita, refusing to take part with them, was expelled from the company. Deeply mortified, he afterwards made sufficient amends for his misconduct. In another existence he obtained the favor of Kāśyapa, and, entering a mountain cave, cleansed the courtyard of a Buddhist stūpa.

LXXXVIII.—Kapphina, the young king of Dakṣiṇāpatha, had 18,000 young courtiers. Proud of this strong body of supporters, he insolently commanded the lord of six cities, Śrāvastī, &c., to appear before him. They, in alarm, took refuge with the Lord. The Lord, in the following terms, challenged Kapphina to come and fight : “If you are standing do not sit, come with as much speed as you can.” By wafting his magic wand aloft, he suddenly brought into existence an innumerable array of veterans of which he took the lead in royal robes. But when Kapphina was about to engage, a voice from heaven declared “Obey the command of Buddha,” and he changed his mind. The Lord instructed him in the Bodhi knowledge, and raised him to the rank of an Arhat when he departed this world.

The Lord said, “A merchant of Bandhumatī feasted Lord Vipāśyī and founded a Vihāra for him in the 71st mundane period. This very man in his other existence as Brahmadaṭṭa, king of Benares, gave wholesome diet to a Pratyeka Buddha who was ill, and raised a stūpa to his honor. For these merits he obtained Arhatship when living as Kapphina, king of Dakṣiṇāpatha.

LXXXIX.—A warder of a fort at Benares once snatched a quantity of food from a girl, and subsequently, putting himself to much suffering from want of food, gave it all to a Pratyeka Buddha. The Buddha showed him miracles. The man on his knees begged instruction in true knowledge, which was granted him. Born at Śrāvastī, this man was named Bhadrīka. He obtained Arhatship from Śākyamuṇi.

XC.—When the Lord sojourned in a grove in the country of Sthulakosṭhaka, that country was under the rule of a king named Koravya. His brother's son Rāshṭrapāla, was a handsome youth, endowed with perfection in every limb and feature. While roaming about in the grove one morning he beheld the Lord proceeding with his followers to the city to collect alms. The signs of greatness on the person of the Lord made a strong impression on the susceptible mind of the youth, who fell at his feet, and solicited conversion. The Lord, however, declined to comply with the request until the youth should obtain the permission of his parents. This was, however, not easy of attainment, as his parents and their relatives and friends did not approve of the plan of the youth. The youth, however, was resolute and his importunity prevailed. He got the permission, was duly ordained, and raised to the rank of an Arhat. The congregation was surprised at this, and begged of the Lord to explain how it was that Rāshṭrapāla, a youth born in a royal family and possessing no preliminary training, should at once become an Arhat. The Lord replied that this was due to the accumulated deserts of good works done by him in former lives. Once on a time the king of Videha, defeated by his enemy, repaired to the wilderness, and, roaming about in great distress from thirst, met a Buddha, and sought his protection. This protection was duly accorded, and the king regained his metropolis and worshipped the Lord for three months, after which he begged that he may be able to acquire true knowledge. That king is now Rāshṭrapāla and earns the fruit of his good work. This explanation, however, did not suffice to satisfy the audience. The feeling seemed to be that the work was not enough for so high a reward as Arhatship. The Lord, therefore, continued. Again in the kalpa when human life extended to twenty-thousand years the Lord Kāśyapa sojourned in the Deer Park near Benares. At that time Benares was under the rule of Kṛtika, a pious king, under whose just administration the country prospered in every way, abounding in men, animals, good crops and flourishing commerce. The youngest son of this king paid a visit to the Deer Park at Rishipatana, and beheld the Lord impressed with 32 great signs and 80 minor indications of greatness, and resplendent with glory more brilliant than a thousand suns put together. Deeply impressed by the sight, he fell at the feet of the Lord, and, sitting aside, listened respectfully to the religious discourse which the Lord delivered. He then sought conversion, and Lord Kāśyapa was satisfied, and when the prince and his relatives sought his protection he had them duly converted. The prince planted an umbrella in honour of the Lord. That prince has now been born as Rāshṭrapāla. "Again, Bhikshus, there lived in former times in the city of Benares a poor Brāhmaṇ, who lived on tubers (Mulika Brāhmaṇa). In order to collect tubers he used to repair to the top of a hill. On one occasion he there met a Pratyeka Buddha in distress, and did everything he could to relieve the distress by offering him all such refreshments as he could command. The Pratyeka Buddha benefitted greatly by his attention, and offered him a boon for his good deeds. The Brāhmaṇ begged that he may be devoid of all human passions, and his prayer was immediately granted. And the person who then was a poor Brāhmaṇ living on roots is now born as prince Rāshtrapāla. In his former existences he had undergone many trials and sufferings in the cause of true religion, to which he was always attached, and in return for it he is now born in a royal family and is endowed with so much personal beauty. And the ultimate reward of his devotion is that he is now come face to face with Arhatship, and acquired perfection in it. This shows that you should always avoid black acts, and betake to white ones which are sure at one time or other to bestow on you their much prized reward." The Bhikshus were greatly delighted by this narration.

This is substantially the same with the story of the king of the Kaurava race which occurs in the Aśoka Avadāna (ante page 14).

A mystic mantra and the praise thereof as a means of promoting longevity. The work professes to have been related by Buddha himself, when sojourning at the Jeta Grove near Śrāvastī, to Manjūsri. The mantra consists of the following words :

ॐ नमो भगवते अपरिमितायुर्ज्ञानसुविनिश्चिततेजोराजाय तथागतयाऽर्हते सम्यक्सम्बुद्धाय । तद्यथा । ॐ पुण्यपुण्य महापुण्य अपरिमितपुण्य अपरिमितपुण्यज्ञान-सम्भारोपचित ॐ सर्वसंस्कारपरिशुद्धधर्मते गगनसमुद्गते स्वभावविशुद्धमहालय-परिवारे स्वाहा ।

“Om, salutation to the Bhagavat ; to the sovereign of endless life, wisdom and unfailing glory ; to the Tathāgata ; to the Arhat ; to the perfect Buddha ; thus, Om, to the soul of the virtue of virtues, the great virtue, the measureless virtue, the knowledge of measureless load of virtue ; and Om, to the possessor of all purified and pure duty ; to him who can rise to the sky ; to the scion of the naturally pure and righteous race, may this be propitious.”

This sentence is repeated a hundred times, and he who recites it, or writes it, or causes it to be written, or keeps it written in his house, or hears it recited, or promulgates it, or worships it with offerings of flowers, incense, aromatics, garlands, unguents, clothes, parasols, flags, bells, standards ; or wears it on his person, is said to receive the full measure of human life. The work is reckoned among the simple Sūtras ; but it is obviously a charm intended to be worn as an amulet, and must be of a comparatively recent date,—an imitation of the Hindu charms of Tāntric origin.

BHADRAKALPA AVADĀNA

भद्रकल्पावदानं ।

Substance, Nepalese paper, 15 $\frac{3}{4}$ × 5 inches. Folia, 23. Lines on a page, 8. Extent in ślokas, 7,110. Character, Newāri. Appearance, old. Verse. Incorrect.

Thirty-four legends on moral subjects, related by Jayaśrī in reply to a query of Jinaśrī who wished to know some of the anecdotes related by Upa Gupta, to his royal pupil Aśoka. The scene of the second narrative was the Bodhimāṇḍa of Buddha Gayā, and that of the first the Kukkuṭa Garden referred to in the Aśoka Avadāna.

Upagauptha opens his narrative thus :—"When the Lord, after having obtained what he desired, thought of returning home, all the gods began to sing hymns in his praise. He taught them the sublime truths of his religion."

I. The first story is that of Yaśodharā, the forsaken wife of Buddha. Suddhodana's nephew, Devadatta, having been repulsed in his advances for her love, became her deadly enemy, and plotted several times to take her life. He accused her before his uncle, alleging that, unless she lives in guilt, how is it that when others become mothers in ten months from their first conception, she should remain big for eighteen. The king did not give credit to these allegations. Then he induced the king to abdicate in his favour for twenty-one days, promising at the end of that period to fetch his son Buddha back to him. During these twenty-one days he tried every means in his power to put an end to Yasodharā's life. He threw her into a tank ; but she was protected and sent to her father by the king of serpents who happened to be there at the time. This tank was long celebrated as Gopātīrtha from another name of Yasodharā. Thrown into a blazing fire she was miraculously protected by the coldness which the fire suddenly assumed. Precipitated from a high hill, she was saved by the kindness of a big monkey. At the expiration of the appointed time Devadatta, unable to fulfil his promise, was imprisoned by the king ; but he was soon after released on the intercession of Yasodharā.

At the end of six years Yasodharā gave birth to a child as ugly as ugly could be. He was named Virūpa. Envious Devadatta taunted Virūpa, by saying, "O Virūpa, do you know your father's name ? Buddha is gone these twelve years and you are at the age of six." Yasodharā consoled her son by saying, "Your father is gone in the search of a desire-fulfilling elixir. He will soon return, and change your ugliness into beauty. Do not believe in what envious Devadatta says to you."

II. After a stay of six years at Dharmadvīpa, Lord Buddha presented himself at Benares with five of his followers. His residence was at Mrigadāva in Rishipaṭaṇa. There was at this time a band of thirty "sons of Belial" who revelled in all manner of licentiousness. One of them lost his mother Bhadrāṅgī who, in company with gods, came one day from the regions of bliss to hear the Lord's lecture. Bhadrāṅgī found these wicked people following two women of bad character ; she found one of them, Kāśikā going away, and took this opportunity of correcting the gay lotharios. She presented herself before them in the guise of Kāśikā, and gradually and artfully led them to the Mrigadāva. There she prayed the Lord to bring these wicked young men to the right path. Immediately after she rose to the sky, and thence said : "If you are to come to me worship Tattāgata, and renounce the path of evil." Following Bhadrāṅgī's advice, they proceeded to the Lord, who instructed them in his faith, and touched them with his right hand. Forthwith, their heads were miraculously shaved, and their garments miraculously changed into yellow rags. They were then sent by the Lord as apostles of his faith. They travelled from place to place in the guise of students (Brahmachāris), preaching the Buddhist gospel.

III. A company of professional sacrificers of Benares, who were absent on a sacrifice at Vrinda, returned and found thirty old vagabonds reclaimed. They immediately placed themselves under the Lord's tuition. The chief of the company was Luchira.

IV. There lived at Kuśālagram, inhabited by the Droṇas, one Pūrṇa, a Brāhmaṇ, who, induced by a celestial voice, proceeded to the Himālaya, and there practised austerities to obtain favours from the Lord. He made thirty-four disciples. With these he proceeded to the Mrigadāva. The Lord touched them with his right hand. Forthwith they were transformed into so many Bhikshus.

V. Uttara and Nalaka were the two sons of one Jayī, the family priest of a king of Tvarkaṭa in the vicinity of Avanti. Uttara was versed in all the Vedas. Nalaka was a kind-hearted man ; he wandered here and there as a hermit, unmindful of his study. They were both sent for their education to their uncle Dritī, whose hermitage lay on the Vindhya Range. Dritī advised them to proceed to the Lord at Mrigadāva, where they were initiated in the duties of silent hermits.

VI. Sabhika was a great controversialist. His mother was a perfect mistress of the art of disputation. She was educated by a Bhikṣuṇī. She obtained the name of Mahādhi or great intelligence. By the merit of her good works she was cured of her bodily deformities for which she was exposed on her birth. She married one Vidyākara, only because she was defeated in a controversy with him. The fruit of this marriage was the great controversialist Sabhika. Sabhika, after having silenced all his antagonists, proceeded to Mrigadāva to measure his powers of ratiocination with the Lord. But on the first sight of that great man Sabhika fell on his knees, and begged him for instruction. By the Lord's command Uttara gave him the definitions of Sambuddha, Arhat, Śramaṇa, Brāhmaṇa, Snātaka, Dviḥja, Vaidika, Vipra, Śrotṛiya, Brahmachārī, Rishi, Parivrājaka, Muni, Tapasvī, Yati and Yogī. Within a short time Sabhika entered the hermitage.

VII. The story of Jaśodevī.

VIII. The story of Grihapati Svastika.

IX. After causing, on his way to Gana, a thousand boatmen to renounce the world, the Lord presented himself one day at the hermitage of the Kāśyapas. There he converted Fulvavilva Kāśyapa, Buddha Kāśyapa, Sarit Kāśyapa* and their nephew Upasena with their numerous followers to his own faith. He gave the following story of their former lives :

* The names are differently given in other works, Urnvilva occurs for the first, Nadi for the second, and Gaya for the third.

“Three royal brothers, Indrarāja, Siṅharāja and Bhadrarāja, proceeded once upon a time from Kaluga to Hastina, where a Tathāgata made his appearance, in order to worship him and receive his blessing. They invited him to their own kingdom, and on his death raised a Stūpa to his honour. They begged of him the boon of ever remaining the servants of Sugata. They are now born as the Kāśyapas.”

X. Once on a time, on the Lord's entrance into the Dharmāraṇya, seven hundred Rīshis explained to him as many different modes of worship. The Lord pronounced them all, without exception, to be false. He explained to them the sublime truths of his own religion. They all obtained Nirvāṇa by accepting his creed.

XI. Rājā Bimbisāra heard one day his family priest teach the Dvātriṅsat lakṣhaṇas, or the 32 signs of Buddhahood. From that time he became disgusted with the world, and panted for the knowledge of the true faith. Just at this time, the rumour of the Lord's appearance in the Jatavana grove reached his ears. He resolved on an interview with him. Great was his surprise when he found the great Rīshi Kāśyapa sitting before the Lord, a convert to the Buddhist faith. By the Lord's instructions the Rājā regained the ease of his mind, and entered on a course of virtuous administration of his kingdom.

XII. Sāriputra and Maudgalyāyana were two foremost teachers among the early Buddhists. They were friends from their early boyhood. They were both proficient in all the sciences of their day. The real name of Sāriputra was Upatishya. He was the last of the seven sons of a Brāhman, Dharmapati of Nāradagrāma, near Rājagriha, by his only wife Sārī. Maudgalāyana was the son of Dhānyāyana of Kelika, a village not far from Nāradagrāma. He was called Maudgalāyana because he was born in the Gotra or clan of the Maudgalāyanas. They both were converted by the Lord himself, and both soon rose to high rank among his followers. Dirghanakha, the maternal uncle of Sāriputra, envying the Lord's great fame, came boastfully forward to silence the Lord by arguments ; but remained one of his most zealous partizans to the end of his life. Jeta, a Rishi, and Ānanda his friend were at this time made converts. Jeta presented the Lord a Vihāra which still goes by his name.

XIII to XXXII. Short stories relating to the conversion of various persons to the Buddhist faith by Buddha himself during his sojourn in the Jetavana grove. The converts were Kāśyapa, a rich Brāhmaṇa, Naradatta the nephew of Asita a Rīshi, Śakti a Brahmanī, Padmā her friend, seven hundred disciples of Rudraka, Rebata a Muni, Anāthapiṇḍada, Pūrṇa and other inhabitants of Śrāvastī. When going to his hermitage in the Veṇuvana at Rājagriha, he appointed Pūrṇa at the head of the Sangha or Chārṇch of Śrāvastī. While journeying through a forest, Buddha found a gang of robbers dividing their booty. The Lord, giving them an equivalent in gold, restored the stolen property to its owners. The robbers became his followers and honoured him greatly when he lived at Rājagriha.

XXXII. The Bhikshus enquired of the Lord how was it that his mother (aunt) Gautamī, though blind, was called Sulochanā or perfect-eyed ? The Lord gave the following explanation : A big white elephant was very fond of his mother. He migrated with his old mother from the Himālaya to the Vindhyan forest where provender was easily procurable. Finding one day a travelling merchant in great distress, the kind animal took compassion upon him, and extricated him from his difficulties. That ungrateful wretch informed the king of Benares, who was in search of a white elephant, of such an animal being available in the Vindhyan forest, a circumstance which led to the poor elephant's being tracked and caught. He was conducted to the Royal Menagerie at Benares. For weeks together the elephant did not take any food, but shed profusion of tears. On being asked the cause he gave vent to his filial apprehensions. The king granted him release. He hastened to find his old mother, with his heart beating with apprehensions. He found her in the forest, blind with tears. On his arrival her eyes cleared up, and she got back her sight. I am that elephant, and Gautamī is the old mother.

XXXIII. The story of Nalini ; told in the Avadāna-kalpalatā.

XXXIV. Invited by his father, Lord Buddha proceeded from Veṇuvana to his capital. The king paid a return visit to his son at Veṇuvana where he heard many edifying lectures. One of them contained the following story : Rājā Sudāsa of Benares had by a lioness a son named Sutasoma. When that son came to the throne he was in the habit of eating privately raw human flesh in the prison house. He was expelled by the nobles from the throne on account of this habit. Wandering in the forests, unattended and alone, he was met by his mother, the lioness, who carried him to celebrate a sacrifice of a hundred royal youths. After ninety-nine princes had been secured already, the ex-king went in search of Sutasoma whose adventures form the subject of another book viz., Sutasomajātaka. The Lord said, I am that Sutasoma.

A philosophical disquisition on the duties appropriate to Buddhist monks. The work is in ten chapters. Its author's name is not given. It opens with a dissertation on Buddhist disposition (Bodhi-chitta). This disposition is of two kinds, one called Bodhi-praṇidhi-chitta, or desire to acquire the true knowledge, and the other Bodhi-prasthāna-chitta, or that disposition of the mind which obtains when that knowledge has been acquired. The second chapter treats of Iṣṭopadeśanā or devotion to good work. This devotion is described to manifest itself in a desire to devote every thing good in this world to the worship of Tathāgata and his sons. The third dwells on three topics, respectively called Pnyānumoda, Adhyesanā and Yāchanā. The first is the disposition to virtue, wishing all creation to be free from pain and the troubles incident to existence ; the second, supplication to all the Buddhas of every quarter for the enlightenment of the minds of those who are immersed in pain ; the third, prayer to Jinas for the suppression of all sensuous desires—to wrest the soul from the bondage of the flesh. These lead to active benevolence, to the administration of medicines to the sick, food to the starving, relief to the poor, and the like,—all which promote the disposition to acquire the true knowledge. The fourth chapter enjoins the devotion of the mind to the mandates of the Buddhas and their sons whereby alone can liberation from the bonds of transmigration be acquired. The fifth is devoted to the means of overcoming all sensuous desires. The sixth to perturbations of the mind and the propriety of suppressing them, as also the cultivation of forbearance (kshānti-pāramitā) ; and the seventh to active penance (Virya-pāramitā) or the subjugation of the passions by active exertion. The longings of the organs of sense and desires having thus been overcome, the eighth chapter, enters upon the subject of cogitation (Dhyāna pāramitā) as to what is good and what is evil. Virtuous actions resulting from a desire to benefit one's own self, are described to be vicious, as they are prompted by a longing for rewards ; this should be suppressed, and good should be done for the sake alone of doing it. Never should one proclaim his own merits, nor the demerits of others. Such cogitations settle the mind to meditation of that which alone is true. The ninth chapter is called Prajñā-pāramitā. It describes the nature of the true knowledge, and in doing so, two doctrines are discussed : 1st, Māyāvāda, or that which ascribes every thing mundane to Māyā or illusion ; and the 2nd Sūnyatāvāda, or pure nihilism. The last chapter expresses a desire that, whatever fruits may arise from the discussion and practice of the rules set forth in the work, may be to the glory of Buddhist devotion.

BODHISATTVA AVADĀNA.

Substance, paper, 15×4 $\frac{3}{4}$. Folia 205. Lines on a page, 9. Extent in ślokas, 4,784. Character Newāri. Date, unknown. Apperance, old. Prose and verse. Very incorrect.

A collection of legends regarding the former lives of the Bodhisattva. They were related at Śrāvastī by the side of the tank Anavatapta, by the Lord Buddha himself, in a series of lectures to his disciples who composed the audience, the subject of the lectures being stories illustrating the means of obtaining moksha. After an eulogy on the extraordinary powers of Sāriputra (Mudgalāyana), the Lord gave an account of his ten sufferings, (See Bodhisattvāvadāna-kalpalatā,) and then recounted a series of stories each of which is called a Jātaka. The stories relate chiefly to meritorious acts performed by Buddha in his previous existences.

Subhāsa Jātaka. In one of his former existences the Lord was a king, Suprabhāsa by name. He was very irascible, and, in an angry moment, severely scolded an elephant driver, who in return spoke to him at length on the merits of charity, mercy, forgiveness, &c. This reacted on the mind of the king, who gradually began to long for Bodhi knowledge.

Vyāghrī Jātaka. In one of his numerous existences the Lord resided on the mount Kulāchala as a hermit. There he found a hungry tigress looking with a wistful eye at her newborn cubs. To relieve the poor creatures from being devoured by their hungry parent, the Lord determined to offer his own body to her. He let himself fall from a high precipice, to the valley where the tigress was, and expired, thereby saving the cubs.

Sivi Jātaka. As king of the Sivis the Lord, after bestowing the whole of his wealth on the poor, bestowed even his eyes to Indra, who begged them of him. Indra, pleased with his munificence, granted him heavenly eyes.

Kulmāsapindī Jātaka. Kulmāspindī, king of Kośala, was none else than the Lord himself. His maxim was that well-timed and well-placed charity is always laudable. A gift is never too small.

Śreshṭhi Jātaka. The Lord was a banker. A Pratyeka Buddha came to his door to beg. The wicked Māra prepared a hell at the door, but the virtuous banker fearlessly passed through the hell, and gave his alms.

Avisahyā śreshṭhi Jātaka. In the course of an infinite number of transmigrations the Lord was once born a rich and munificent banker. Indra stole all his property except a scythe for cutting grass and a bit of string for tying bundles of grass. The kind man used to gather grass, and sell it to relieve his poor neighbours.

Śāśa Jātaka. Once on a time the Lord transmigrated into the brute world, and became a hare. He used to lecture on moral subjects to two of his friends, one a jackal, the other an ape. Indra demanded food of him. Having nothing else to give he jumped into a blazing fire, and requested Indra to eat his roasted flesh.

Agastya Jātaka. The Lord was once born a rich Brāhmaṇ of the name of Agastya. He practised austerities in an island in the Southern sea, where Indra used to come and beg the Rishi's food and thereby deprive him of the means of sustenance. After four days the Rishi died of hunger.

Maitribala Jātaka. The Lord was once born a most charitable king of the name of Maitribala. He gave away whatever was asked of him; once he gave five portions of his flesh to five Yakshas who longed for human flesh, and asked it of him.

Visvambhara Jātaka. Visambhara was the prince of the Sivi. He gave away an elephant much esteemed by the Sivi to a Brāhmaṇ. The Sivi complained of this before their king, the Prince's father, who banished Visambhara from his kingdom. Visambhara went to the forest with his wife and children. A Brāhmaṇ begged as gift the boys. He was instantly complied with. Indra then demanded Visambhara's wife. Her too Visambhara gave away. Afterwards he was known as Śākyamuni.

Yajña Jātaka. King Yajña, or Buddha in a former birth, finding his kingdom afflicted by a drought, consulted the Brāhmaṇs as to the remedies for the evil. They advised him to perform a sacrifice. The king did not relish the idea, because it involved the slaughter of a large number of animals. He established alms-houses in every city, in every village, and in every street.

Śakra Jātaka. In one of his previous existences the Lord was born as Indra, and when the Devas had to fight with the Asuras his prowess alone was sufficient to overpower the enemy.

Brāhmaṇa Jātaka. The Lord was born in the family of a Brāhmaṇ. He went to a Guru who taught him many Śāstras. The Guru ordered all his disciples to procure the Dakṣiṇā—the fees due to a guru—by theft. All consented, except that boy.

Unmādayantī Jātaka. The Lord was the king of the Sivas. The maddening fairy-like beauty of Unmādayantī, wife of one of his ministers, captivated his heart. Some of his counsellors advised him to possess her by force. But the wicked advice was spurned by the king.

Supārāga Jātaka. The Lord was named Supārāga. He was a clever merchant, and expert man of business. In his old age he, along with a number of other merchants, undertook a voyage to trade with the inhabitants of a coast named Bharu Kachchha. He, with his whole fleet, was one night overtaken by a terrible storm. Supārāga fell on his knees and prayed and worshipped Sugata. Instantly the storm blew over, the wind was hushed, the sea was calm. The fleet reached safe its place of destination, and the merchants enriched themselves by very profitable trade.

Matsya Jātaka. Buddha was in the course of his transmigrations born a fish. He was the lord of all the fishes. He lived in a large ancient pond. He instructed his fellow-creatures by his edifying lectures on charity, righteousness, &c. Suddenly one summer the water of the tank was on the point of drying out. The fish-king looked toward the sky, and made a vow, saying, "I will never see the destruction of so many of my friends." On this Indra sent a heavy shower of rain, and filled the tank with water.

Vartakapota Jātaka. Once upon a time a forest was on fire. The animals of the forest fled towards every quarter. One crippled, weak, wingless bird, unable to fly, solicited Agni to desist from burning. Instantly the fire was quenched. The wingless bird was the Lord himself.

Kumbha Jātaka. In one of his existences the Lord was, under the name of Kumbha, king over the Devas. Finding his allies and his subjects much addicted to drinking, he rose up to heaven, and thence harangued them with the voice of thunder. The subject of course was Temperance.

Aputraka Jātaka. In another existence, the Lord renouncing the world delivered a grand lecture on the transitory character of everything worldly, in order to rebuke those who re-entered the world after adopting the ascetic state. He said—the trouble of maintaining a family is a positive hindrance to Mukti.

Visa Jātaka. The Lord was born in the family of a Brāhmaṇ. He had six brothers and a sister. All of them practised austerities. They were attended by only one servant girl. She gathered fruits, and divided them for the brothers and sister. Indra, for five successive days, stole the eldest brother's share, in order to examine the imperturbability of his temper. He was a little moved on the first day; on the second he suppressed his hunger; from the third he had no desire for eating.

Śreshṭhi Jātaka. Born in the family of a Brāhmaṇ, the Lord was named Śreshṭhi. He went to a hermitage. He baffled all the endeavours of his friends to bring him back to his home, by showing them by the clearest arguments that the highest pleasures are to be had only in a hermit's life.

Buddhabodhi Jātaka. The Lord was born in the family of a Brāhmaṇ. He and his wife renounced the world together. They lived in the same forest. One day as the Lord, at the end of his austerities, was gathering dust at a beautiful spot, and his wife was repeating the meditative formula, in came a young king, who, captivated by the beauty of her person, at once ordered his servants to take her into his carriage. She cried loudly for help. Then coming to the hermit the king found him not the least agitated by the loss of his wife. He admired the firmness, begged his pardon, and restored him his wife.

Haṇsa Jātaka. In the series of existences from the lowest form of animalculæ to man, the soul of the Lord once entered the external cover of a king of the flamingoes who lived at Mānsarovar. He had a general as generous as himself. Brahmadata, King of Benares, longing to have a sight of this virtuous pair, caused a splendid tank to be dug in the suburbs of his metropolis, which he had beautified at an immense cost. He issued a proclamation to the purpose that any bird coming to the tank would be perfectly safe. Some of the flamingoes who went to Mānsarovar were loud in the praise of the tank at Benares. The King of the flamingoes, with his faithful general, resolved to pay a visit to the famous tank. But when floating on its waters the king bird was caught by men who were kept on purpose by Brahmadatta. All his followers fled away at the time of his danger ; but his general followed him wherever they led him. Brahmadata seated them on a splendid throne, welcomed them, feasted them, and granted them liberty. The flamingo discoursed long on the advantages of virtue, and then took his departure.

Mahābodhi Jātaka. Again in another existence the Lord, under the name of Mahābodhi, delighted his large audience with religious discourses flowing smoothly from his lips. He travelled from country to country, visiting many kings, and captivated men's hearts by his eloquence, at once soothing and persuasive. He was a hermit of the rank of an Āchārya. Men flocked to him by thousands. Some of the ministers of a King whom he visited warned him to keep a watchful eye upon the man. "He is a spy," they said, "come to deceive us by the power of his speech."

The King, thus advised, doubted the honesty of the sage. One day when the hermit came to his presence, the King did not salute him. The hermit, perceiving this change in the King's conduct, attempted to go away. The King said "Where do you go from us, Sir ?" "You are unfit for religious discourse," was the reply, "I shall go to the forest." The King found it was no time then for detecting his knavery. He therefore allowed him to go, but requested him to come back after a while. The sage assented to this request. After practising in a forest four dhyānas and soon obtaining "five experiences," he returned to the King's court.

Many of the ministers came forward to refute the arguments of the pious-hermit. One of them said : "Who can be the author of the color and fragrance of the lotus and the like ? This earth is the result of nature (svabhāva)." Another said—"It is impossible that this earth should be the result of an accident, and therefore have the wise concluded that it must have proceeded from one who is absolute mind and felicity." A third remarked, that the assumption of a single cause for objects of various nature resulting from diverse causes, is inconsistent. They must proceed from acts performed in previous lives, or attempts to do good would never be followed by pain. Another was of opinion that "woods of various shapes, colors and qualities could not result from the fruits of works performed in former existences ; were it so, still woods destroyed do not again become woods, so the dead do not come to life again. Therefore we should seek happiness while we live." The hermit, perceiving that the King was fond of illustrations, retired to his hermitage. There, by a miracle, he created a large monkey, took out its skin, and made of it a covering for his own body, and repaired to the royal presence. Every one accused him of killing a monkey, and laughed at his conduct. "Why," asked the hermit, "if all this be either natural or brought about by previous work, I have done no wrong in killing a monkey."

After this argument, the King cared very little for the sophisms of the philosophers, but placed himself entirely under the guidance of the pious hermit.

Mahākapi Jātaka. The Lord was once born a monkey, dwelling in a woody spot by the side of the Himālaya. A man, who had lost his way in the forest, while gathering fruits, fell from a lofty tree into a deep lake. The monkey, who was close by, rescued him by carrying him on its back over the steep precipice. At last weary with toil the poor creature fell fast asleep, appointing the man to watch him. The man wanted to kill the animal for his meat, and threw a stone at it, in order to effect his purpose. The sound of the stone broke the monkey's sleep. It found from what quarter it had come. It rebuked the man gently, and showed him his way out of the forest. In a short time the man died of a loathsome disease.

Sarabha Jātaka. A Sarabha was chased by a king on horseback. While crossing a deep ravine the king fell into it. The Sarabha, seeing the horse without its rider, immediately perceived what had happened, and proceeded directly to rescue the king. This Sarabha was Buddha in one of his transmigrations.

Ruru Jātaka. A man was carried down by an impetuous stream. He cried piteously for help. A golden-colored stag (Ruru) rescued him from danger. He made the man promise on no account to discover the place of the stag's residence and let him go.

Meanwhile the queen of the place had dreamt of receiving lectures from a stag as brilliant as gold. On receiving the promise of a large reward, that very man now betrayed his trust, and showed the king where the stag dwelt.

The king aimed his shaft at the stag. But the animal neared the king of his own accord, and asked him who had shewed him the place. On finding the man to be no other than he whom he had once rescued, the stag told the king of the man's faithlessness. The king wanted to kill him, but the stag interposed. The king was highly pleased with him, took him home, honored him, feasted him, and received lectures from him. He taught the royal family lessons of high importance in the true faith.

The stag was none else than the Lord himself.

Kapī Jātaka. While bathing in a river a certain king found a very delicious fig (Ficus religiosa) floating down the stream. The king took it up and wanted to have more. He went high up the stream and found a big fig tree inhabited by monkeys who lived solely on its fruits. One of them was seen sending the monkeys off from the sight of the royal army. The king, thinking him to be the chief, cut with an arrow the branch on which he stood. He declared himself to be the king of the monkeys, and discoursed long with the king, on man's destiny and on virtue, charity, patience, penitence and so on.

This monkey chief was Buddha himself.

Kshānti Jātaka. A hermit practised austerities in a wilderness. A king came into that forest with the ladies of his house. One day while he slept, the ladies, in the course of their walk, came to the hermit's grove. The hermit welcomed them, and extolled the powers of righteousness before them. The king, seeing a hermit amidst the royal dames, flew at him in a rage, and cut two of his fingers. Instantly he felt a burning fever. The hermit was the Lord Buddha.

Brahmā Jātaka. Once on a time the Lord, born in the regions of Brahmā, came down to earth and brought the king of Videha, who was ruining himself by associating with low companions, to the path of justice and virtue.

Hastī Jātaka. An elephant supplied with his own flesh, the food to a hundred men who were banished from their houses, and were almost dying of hunger. This elephant was the Lord in one of his former existences.

Sutasoma Jātaka. Subhāshita, a Brāhmaṇ, was soliciting alms from Sutasoma, when suddenly there was a great uproar in the female apartment. Sutasoma, asking Subhāshita to wait a little, went into the seraglio. King Saudāsa (vide Avadāna-śataka, story 89) got hold of him, and carried him away. Sutasoma remembered the promise he had made to Subhāshita solicited Saudāsa to grant him a moment's leave that he may grant some money to the Brāhmaṇ. After long entreaty Saudāsa permitted him to go. Sutasoma, after redeeming his promise, returned as he had engaged. Saudāsa, highly pleased to find the prince a man of his word, permitted him to ask four boons. The boons Sutasoma asked were the following :—

That Saudāsa should always speak the truth, leave the slaughter of animals, liberate all captive princes, and give up eating raw flesh.

Though reluctant, Saudāsa nevertheless granted these boons.

This prince Sutasoma of the Kaurava dynasty was none else than lord Buddha in one of his previous existences.

Ayo Jātaka. A royal youth once obtained permission from his parents to proceed to an hermitage. This prince was the Lord.

Mahisa Jātaka. A buffalo, though constantly harassed by a wicked monkey, did not try to injure him. This buffalo was the Lord.

Śatapatra Jātaka. A lion, that had a bone stuck into his throat, went to a Śatapatra, who, pitying the sufferings of the lion, took the bone out of his throat. The same lion, while devouring a large quantity of venison, was asked for a bit by the Śatapatra, who was at that time very hungry. But the lion gave him nothing. The Śatapatra was not the least moved by it. This Śatapatra was the Lord himself.

After this story follows a few verses enumerating the different merits of offering various things to Buddha, as also of reading and of hearing read works on the Buddhist religion.

No. B. 15.

BODHISATTVĀVADĀNA-KALPALATĀ.

बोधिसत्त्वावदानकल्पलता ।

Substance, yellow paper, 10½ × 4½ inches. Folia, 152. Lines on a page, 10. Extent in ślokas, 3,705. Character, Devanāgarī. Appearance, old. Verse. Very incorrect.

A store-house of legends regarding Buddha's former existences. It seems to be partly a sequel to, and partly a poetical amplification of, the work noticed under the last preceding No. It is called a 'tree yielding whatever is wanted of it,' (kalpalatā) and the metaphor is kept up in the generic name of its subdivisions, which are called pallava or "leaves," and not adhyāyas or "chapters." The codex under notice is obviously incomplete, as it commences from the 51st chapter or pallava. It appears, however, from the presence of an invocatory verse at the beginning of the chapter, and the absence of all such invocations at the beginnings of subsequent chapters, that the work was divided into two parts, of which the first included 50 chapters, and the second 58. Each chapter contains a distinct story, illustrating a particular moral maxim, or an incidence in the life of the saint. The author of the work was Kshemendra, who had the title of Mahākavi or "the great poet." He was probably the same with the author of the Kathā-sarit-sāgara, the archetype of Somadeva Bhaṭṭa's Vrihatkathā. If this identification be tenable, the date of the work would be the 5th century of the Christian era.

LI.—Ten Sufferings. Lord Buddha, during his sojourn by the side of the tank Anavatapta, while giving an account of the former lives of Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana, illustrated the maxim that "every creature must suffer from the effects of his works" by adverting to the ten mundane pains which he suffered. He said :

(1) "In one of my previous existences, when I had the name of Kharvota, I killed my half-brother at the instigation of my wife, Kālikā : I have an ulcer on the top of my right toe as a consequence.

(2) "As Arthadatta, a merchant, I killed one of my own calling, who was much opposed to my interests. The consequence is, that I have suffered from a sore caused by the prick of a catechu thorn.

(3) "In another existence, as Chapala I threw away, with my own hand, the contents of Upārishya's alms-bowl. This Upārishya was a Pratyeka Buddha. I have my alms-bowl always empty for that outrageous conduct.

(4) "As Bharadvāja, I falsely charged my elder brother Vaśiṣṭha with holding criminal intercourse with a maid-servant, who was an anchorite ; and that is why Sundarī has published a similar scandal against me in my present existence.

(5) "As a Vaisya, Mriṇāla by name, I wanted to live with Bhadrā, a public prostitute, on the condition that she should not allow any body else to have connection with her. Finding her one day in the company of another, in a fit of anger, I killed her. Consequently a Bhikṣuṇī has brought a false charge against me in this life.

(6) "As Manthara, a Brāhmaṇa, finding one day my neighbours giving a splendid feast to Vipasyī, I railed at them, saying, 'these stupid bald-heads should be fed with barley and weavelled kodra ; they do not deserve rich viands.' I have now to live upon kodra and barley in consequence of these irreverent words.

(7) "Born in ancient days as Uttara, I spoke ill of one Pudgala. I have suffered greatly for it, and had to lead a vicious life for six years in the present existence.

(8) "There was a rich patriarch, Dhanavān by name, in the country called Karpaṭa. He had a son named Śrīmān. Tiktamukha, 'bitter-faced,' a medical practitioner of the place, cured Śrīmān of various diseases, but obtained nothing for his remuneration. When Śrīmān fell ill again, Tiktamukha put a period to his life by administering a strong poison to him. I was that medical man, and for my treacherous conduct to Śrīmān, I suffer from spermatorrhœa in this life.

(9) "In another existence, as a fisherman, I took great delight at the sight of a large fish under convulsions of death from repeated strokes of the axe. I suffer from cephalgia in consequence of that demoniac conduct.

(10) "Born as an athlete, I treacherously put one of my antagonists to death. I suffer from rheumatism for that deadly sin."

Rukmavatī Avadāna. The saint then related the following story : Śachipati, or Indra, once came to pay his respects to the saint, and, finding him smile, enquired after its reason. The Lord, recalling to his memory some ancient events, said : "There was one Rukmavatī in the city of Utpalāvati ; she found a young woman, ravenously hungry after delivery, just on the point of eating up her new-born baby ; immediately Rukmavatī cut her breast with a sharp knife, and offered it to the hungry mother. When news of this event reached the heavens, Indra presented himself before that wonderful woman, and asked her if she had any agitation in her mind at the time of performing that super-human deed ? She replied in the negative, which was of course true. Indra granted her a boon by which she was transformed into a man. Soon after, the king of the city breathed his last, and the crown was offered to Rukmavatī, the newly made man. His reign was the happiest ever recorded in the annals of Utpalāvati.

"In the next life Rukmavatī was born in the family of a rich banker. The banker's son always thought deeply of the miserable condition of birds. Finding no other way of relieving them, he proceeded to a cremation ground, cut his own flesh into minute pieces, and distributed them to the winged animals. A big bird plucked out his eyes. The pain was excruciating, but Sattvavara, the banker's son, was all firmness. He discoursed with perfect composure on the evanescent character of everything human, and on the great merit of charity.

"He was again born as a great Brāhmaṇa. In a short time he got the reputation of a wise man. Finding a tigress on the point of devouring her new-born whelp, he offered his own body, which saved the young tiger's life."

LIII.—The story of Subhāshitagaveshi ; to be found in the Avadāna Śataka, S. 38, p. 29.

LIV.—Sattvaushadha Avadāna. When the Lord converted Pushyilā, a female ogre, a smile was seen on his lips. Indra, who was near, enquired after the cause of his smile. The Lord said he was thinking of some ancient events. In the days of yore, there was a king named Mahendra Sena in the city of Mahendravatī. He had a son Sattvaushadha by name. Diseased people from different quarters of the globe used to come to him. They were invariably cured by his touch. After his death, wise people in the neighbourhood kept his corpse exposed near the border of a forest, where it was miraculously preserved from rotting. People still recovered their health by touching his corpse.

The Lord said to Indra, "a future king Aśoka will erect a chaitya at the spot where Sattvaushadha's body was preserved. I am that Sattvaushadha."

LV.—The story of Sarvandada ; to be found in the Aśoka Avadāna.

LVI.—Pāshāṇa-sarpa Avadāna. The Lord was living at Hingumardana, the king of which place had a great veneration for him. One day the ministers of the king complained of a terrible snake, which lived on mount Pāshāṇa, and destroyed a large number of people every day. The Lord undertook to quiet the serpent. He was perfectly successful. The serpent became a rigid Buddhist from that time.

LVII.—Bālokshī Avadāna. There were four stūpas at Pāshāṇa. The Lord erected a fifth one himself. At Bālokshī he induced a rich banker to erect a stūpa, celebrated afterwards as Bālokshīya stūpa. The Lord converted Dambara, a Yaksha of the village Dambara, and Mallikā, a Chāṇḍālī of Bhaṇḍālagrāma. At Pāṭala he made Poṭala, a follower of his creed, to erect a splendid stūpa on his hair and nails. The Lord said to Indra a king Millinda will erect a stūpa at Pātala.

LVIII.—Puṇyabala Avadāna. The Lord was seen smiling at Pushkalāvati. Indra asked the reason of his smiling. The Lord said there was a king, Puṇyabala by name, at Puṇyavat. One day when going to his villa he found by the road-side a miserable diseased old man, suffering greatly. Touched with pity the king established a hospital in his city. He used to inspect the cures effected by the physicians in his service. One day, on coming to superintend the hospital he found a blind old man, complaining the loss of his sight. On being apprised of the King's presence, the old man approached him and said, "O king, if you could grant me your right eye I would recover my sight." Instantly the king plucked out his eye. This old man was Indra. He threw off his disguise, replaced the king's eye, and granted him several boons.

LIX.—Kuṇāla Avadāna. King Aśoka of Pāṭaliputra had many wives. His son Kuṇāla, by Padmāvati, had peculiarly graceful eyes. His eyes attracted the attention of Tishyarakshā, one of his numerous step-mothers ; she became enamoured of him. But Kuṇāla was true to his wife Kāṇchanamālā. He rejected with scorn the offers of a vicious step-mother's love. Tishyarakshā determined to destroy his eyes, the causes of her shame. Kuṇāla proceeded by order of his father to Takshaśilā to war against its rebellious governor. Anxiety on account of the absence of a dear son produced serious illness in the king. He suffered greatly, and it was only Tishyarakshā's care that cured him. As a reward she was allowed to reign supreme for seven days. During these seven days, she wrote to the Governor of Takshaśilā to pull out the eyes of Kuṇāla. That letter was intercepted. It fell into the hands of Kuṇāla, who, honoring the command of the reigning empress, caused his own eyes to be destroyed. Kāṇchanamālā, his wife, brought him back to the capital. Aśoka, who knew nothing of what had transpired, was all in tears at the piteous condition of his son. People asked Kuṇāla if he bore any grudge against her who was the cause of his misfortune. He said "No. I am quite satisfied with my step-mother's conduct." His professions were all true, and because they were true, he got his eyes back, and they were even more charming than before.*

* This version of the story is, in several respects, different from what has been given in the Aśoka Avadāna (vide ante, p. 11).

LXIII.—Pippalāyana Avadāna.—In the town of Magadha there lived a Brāhmaṇ named Nyagrodhakalpa. His wife Surūpā gave birth to a beautiful son under a pippala tree. This son was named Pippalāyana, or the son of a pippala tree. Averse to the pleasures of the world, the son refused to marry. But on the urgent solicitations of his father, he produced a golden image, saying, if any one could procure him a girl as fair as the image, he would marry, well knowing no terrestrial being could equal the image in beauty. After a long search, a friend of his father found Bhadrā, the daughter of Kapila, possessed of the necessary qualification. Her colour was as bright as that of gold ; but she too was much against marriage, a circumstances which led Pippalāyana to accept her as his bride, because he knew full well that the duties of married life will never have to be endured by him. Pippalāyana obtained Bodhi knowledge from the instructions of Kāśyapa, then dwelling under the shade of a sacred tree, Bahupatra by name. Pippalāyana was afterwards celebrated under his patronymic as Mahā Kāśyapa. Bhadrā too obtained the highest bliss by renouncing the world.

On being asked the reasons of their rapid advancement, the lord said, Pippalāyana, in one of his former existences, was a poor man; he nevertheless feasted Śikhī, a Buddha, when he was almost dying from want of food. In another existence, he endowed a splendid stūpa, erected by his father King of Kriki, with a rich golden parasol.

LXIV.—Kinnarī Avadāna. Vidyādhara, a serpent-catcher, attempted to capture the king of serpents, and drag him out from his abode by means of drugs and mystic incantations. The king, greatly terrified, took shelter with a hunter, named Padmaka. This man killed Vidyādhara with poisoned arrows, and obtained from his protégé a charmed noose of wonderful power. On his death he bequeathed the noose to his son Utpala, who dwelt at Hastināpura in the vicinity of Valkalāyana's hermitage. Once upon a time Utpala heard a charming song resounding in the air. Learning it was being sung by an exceedingly beautiful Kinnarī,* he captured her by means of his noose. The Kinnarī, to regain her liberty, offered to give him her 'crown-jewel, which could lend the power of traversing the universe at pleasure. When the two were settling their bargain, in came Sudhana, a young prince of Hastinā, on a hunting excursion. Utpala gave him the crown-jewel, and the Kinnarī married him, and the married couple proceeded to the palace.

At this time, there lived in the royal household two Brāhmaṇas, Kapila and Pushkara, the former serving as priest to the King, and the latter, in the same capacity to the prince. They were vain of their learning, and always quarrelled with each other. One of the fuditories of the king rebelling, the king directed his son to lead an army against the rebellious vassal. Sudhana left his wife with her crown-jewel under the care of his mother. The king, after his son's departure, dreamt an inauspicious dream, and Kapila his priest advised him to offer a Kinnarī as a burnt offering to propitiate the enraged divinity who had caused the dream. Kapila was a shrewd man who took this opportunity of humbling his rival, for he knew full well that the prince was sure to die if the Kinnarī were killed in a sacrifice. But he was day appointed. The queen privately warned her daughter-in-law, and sent her away with the crown-jewel, to Kinnarapura.

The Kinnarī left a ring and some charmed butter with Valkalāyana, requesting him to hand the two things over to Sudhana.

Sudhana returned victorious from the war. But his joy was damped by the loss of his wife. He determined to proceed to Kinnarapura, and immediately set forth in a northerly direction. On his way he obtained the ring and the butter from Valkalāyana which helped him immensely in overcoming the fatigues of his journey. He crossed the mountains Himālaya, Kuladu, Ajapatha, Kāmarūpa, Ekadhara, Vajraka, and Khadira, one after another, and encountered many adventures. Beyond mount Khadira he found two great mountains turning on a wheel which made that road impassable. He destroyed the axle of the wheel, and fixed the mountains in their proper places. After this adventure, he had to ford the Guhā, Patangā, Rodinī, Hasinī and several other furious mountain streams before he reached Kinnarapura. There he met his wife, and the two wept tears of joy.

The Lord said "I am that Kinnarī and I am that Sudhana."

LXV.—Nalinī Avadāna. Asked by his audience to give an account of the preceding existence of his parents, the Lord said : King Kāśyapa had a daughter named Nalinī. When she was of a marriageable age, she was placed by her father near the hermitage of a sage named Kāśyapa, who had a youthful son of great beauty, begot by a deer. The youth was named Ekaśringī, because he had a short horn on his head. Nalinī met the youth, brought him to her father's house, and was married to him. Ekaśringī afterwards took other wives, and had by them a thousand sons. The sage Kāśyapa afterwards became Suddhodana ; the deer, Gautamī ; King Kāśyapa, Daṇḍapāni ; Ekaśringī, myself ; Nalinī, Yasodharā ; and the thousand sons, my Śrāvakas and followers.

LXVI.—The story of Kavikumāra ; vide Avadāna of that name.

LXVII.—Sangharakshita Avadāna. Sangharakshita, the son of Buddha-rakshita, was intended, from his conception, by his father to be a disciple of Śāriputra. Acting according to the instructions of that great teacher, Sangharakshita renounced the world. A few of his friends invited him to accompany them on a voyage. He accepted their invitation. When their ship was far away from land, it was overtaken by a sudden storm. Every one feared that his end was come. But a voice from heaven quieted their mind. It said, "Cast Sangharakshita overboard and save yourselves." They threw him overboard, and he was carried to the Nāgaloka. The Nāgas, unable to bear the pure refulgence of his person, managed to throw him into the ship again. But the unfortunate Bhikshu, while sleeping, was again cast overboard, and left alone on a desert shore by his inhuman companions. Unmoved by sufferings, Sangharakshita resolved to travel through the whole length and breadth of the earth. He passed through many vihāras, witnessing various extraordinary scenes, each testifying to the truth of the great principle that the merits of a work are never destroyed. Once he lodged at a vihāra where he found the Bhikshus to be very simple and well-behaved people. They collected their vegetables, dressed their curries, and prepared their food. But as soon as the viands were placed on the plates, each grain of rice became transformed into a large wooden club. The Bhikshus took the clubs up, and began to strike at one another. They continued fighting in this way till the ground was all covered over with blood. At the end of the fight, they quietly sat down, talking as old friends. On enquiry, Sangharakshita came to learn that in a previous existence they had fought at a vihāra where the Bhikshus were eating, and this was a daily punishment for that great misconduct.

At another vihāra Sangharakshita obtained, with much difficulty, an empty room on condition that he was to keep strict silence. But there, the presiding divinity of the place appeared before him, complained of the criminal and unnatural conduct of the Bhikshus, and requested him to reform them. He instantly began to preach, and was in a short time master of the place. The five hundred Bhikshus who dwelt there were all corrected, and converted. With these he proceeded through the sky to the place where the Lord Buddha was then residing. Buddha preached to the new converts, and they returned home well pleased. Finding the Lord alone Sangharakshita said, "O Lord, on my way back I have seen animals of the shape of pillars, walls &c. What are they? In consequence of what sin have they got such unnatural shapes?" The Lord said, "they were all Śrāvakas to the Lord Kāśyapa. They had spat on the walls of the monastery of Sanghagriha, and therefore they now suffer."

Sangharakshita easily obtained Arhatship. The Lord said the reason of his high and rapid advancement was that in one of his previous existences, he had made a samādhi under the instruction of Lord Kāśyapa.

LXVIII.—Padmāvatī Avadāna. The Bhikshus asked the Lord why and for what sin, on the part of Yaśodharā was she, on her first delivery, ordered by Suddhodana to be put to death. The Lord said, there was a king Brahmadatta by name, at Kampilla. He picked up in the forest a destitute girl, Padmāvatī, who scattered lotuses at every step she moved, and made her his favourite queen. This girl was born of a hind, who had drunk of a portion of Śāndilya's seed. She was very simple-minded. Other queens, envious of her position, used to play tricks upon her, and at the time of her first delivery cheated her most shamefully. These wicked ladies, on the occasion, told her, "Dear Padmā, you are a rustic girl, you do not know how to give birth to a royal child. Let us help you." She yielded. They covered her eyes, threw into the river the twin boys she brought forth, and decked her face with gore. They deceived her by telling that it was only a lump of flesh that she had given birth to, and it had been thrown into the river. At the same time they informed her husband that Padmā had eaten up her two new-born sons. The king, enraged at her inhuman conduct, ordered her to instant execution. But there were shrewd men in the court, who privately saved her life.

The divinity presiding over Śāndilya's hermitage appeared to the king in a dream, and revealed the whole truth to him. The king made a strict investigation in the harem, and found that Padmāvati had been perfectly innocent. He became disconsolate, and gave vent to loud lamentations.

Soon after some fishermen appeared at the court, and presented the king with two infants who betrayed their royal lineage by the resemblance of their features with those of the king. They were reported to have been found in a vessel floating on the river. The courtier who saved Padmā's life now wished to produce her before the king. But she refused to return, and proceeded to her father's hermitage. After the death of her father, she travelled through various places in the habit of a Parivrājikā. In the course of her peregrinations she stopped at Benares. Brahmadata conducted her with great honour to his capital from that place.

"In a previous existence Padmāvati, while yet a girl, had given a lotus with which she was playing to a Pratyeka Buddha, but wantonly had taken it back. Because she had given a lotus, therefore at every step she produced a lotus ; because she had taken it back, therefore she was ordered to execution. This Padmāvati is Yaśodharā."

LXIX.—Buddha-prasāhinī Avadāna. King Aśoka lived at Pāṭali-putra. He erected chaityas and raised stūpas over Sugata's relics collected from various quarters, even from Nāgaloka, and always feasted the Buddhist Sangha. The stūpas raised by him numbered eighty-four thousand. He used to feast the Sangha every day. One day a vain Bhikshu, told an illiterate old man : "Do you, old man, know why the king feeds you ? He will ask you some questions on the mysteries of our religion." The old man felt very much distressed, for he was perfectly innocent of all learning, and greatly disliked being exposed. But the goddess Buddha-prasādhinī appeared before him, encouraged him, and instructed him by saying "Tell the king in reply, 'hear O King, the sum and substance of all religion. The deposits in a treasury are but fuels to the fire of greed. The meritorious works performed with wealth, spread all over the earth. Eating and sleeping are for the satisfaction of those only that are blinded by ignorance.'"

Aśoka presented the old man a common piece of cloth interwoven with golden threads. This old man obtained Arhatship after performing a samādhi, under the instruction of the gods. On another occasion king Aśoka, finding the vestment of a Bhikshu highly perfumed, asked him the reason. The Bhikshu said, "I lived a month in heaven under a Pārijāta tree ; and thence the odour." From the time of this conversation Aśoka undertook to dedicate holy gardens to the three Ratnas.

LXX.—Mādhyantika Avadāna. Mādhyantika, a Bhikshu, was sent to Kāshmir as a missionary by his spiritual guide Ānanda. Kāshmir was at that time peopled solely by the Nāgas. The Nāgas poured a shower of arrows upon him. But these weapons formed a splendid parasol over his head. The Nāgas, wondering at this miraculous result, granted him an uninhabited site, and he very soon converted that place into a Vihāra.

LXXI.—Śoṇavāsī Avadāna. Śoṇavāsī was a propagator of the Buddhist faith at Mathurā. He was asked by two athletes the meaning of the term Śoṇavāsī. He said : "Finding an old man not willing to exchange his ścṇa or ochre-colored vestment even for a royal robe, I panted for a similar ochre-colored cloth, hence I am called Śoṇavāsī."

At Urumuṇḍa a hill in Mathurā he converted Naṭa and Bhaṭa, two Nāgas, and erected two Vihāras of the same name in commemoration of their conversion.

LXXII.—Upagupta Avadāna. Upagupta was intended by his father, Gupta of Mathurā, to be a disciple of Śoṇavāsī. Upagupta had deep reverence for Śoṇavāsī. Vāsavadattā, a prostitute, finding Upagupta very handsome, desired him to call it hers. Upagupta said, "This is not the proper time for going to a prostitute : I shall call at the proper time." Some time after this, Vāsavadattā poisoned one of her paramours at the instigation of another. She was sentenced to be killed with torture. The executioner cut her nose, her ears, her hair, and took away her clothes. Upagupta, thinking that to be a proper time for seeing a prostitute, appeared before Vāsavadattā, and instructed her in his faith, which gave her great consolation. Upagupta became an Arhat ; he conquered Kāma and commanded him to exhibit Sugata's beauty. Kāma transformed himself into Sugata, assuming a brilliant form, with large eyes shut in meditation, and still eye-brows. Upagupta converted eighteen lacs of the people of Mathurā.

LXXIII.—Nāgadosha Avadāna. See Aśokāvadāna.

LXXIV.—Sampādī Avadāna. Aśoka was a Kalpavriksha to all beggars. He gave away ninety-six lacs of gold pieces in thirty-six years. At the time of his death his grand-nephew Sampādī prevented his treasurers from obeying the orders of the old king. Aśoka, having nothing else at hand, gave away one-half of the pill he was desired to use, and at last, by the advice of Rādhagupta his minister, granted the whole kingdom to the Sangha. Sampādī bought it back at the cost of four crores of golden dinars.

LXXV.—Svastimān Avadāna. Svastimān, a Jina, who lived at Śrāvastī, told the Bhikshus, that ignorance is at the root of all the vices of the world.

LXXVI.—Vidura Avadāna. Jina found a large animal suffering excruciating torture from the bite of innumerable worms subsisting on its ulcers. Jina said, "This animal was in the course of the transmigration of his soul, a king, named Vidura ; and he beat a Pratyeka Buddha who had entered his seraglio, though the person had entered it only to teach his wives the true religion. He will have to suffer the tortures of hell-fire, to be born in the Chaṇḍāla caste, to kill a holy man, and again to suffer in hell. Born a man he will have to take ordination as a monk from the teacher Uttara, and to be punished by Kāśīrāja for being honored by his wives."

LXXVII.—Alpasvāsa-Mahāsvāsa Avadāna. Four serpents, Dhritarāshṭra Virūrha, Virūpāksha, Dhanādhipa, and two men, Kaiṇakeya and his nephew Śaila, all obtained the highest bliss from Jina's instructions. They all lived in or about the forest Aḍumāya. The Lord Jina said, they all had been attentive to the lectures of Kāśyapa Buddha in their previous existences, under the names of Alpasvāsa and Mahāsvāsa.

LXXVIII.—Sakra chyavana Avadāna. See Aśoka Avadāna, ante, p. 15.

LXXIX.—Jivaśarmā Avadāna. Jivaśarmā was a learned Brāhmaṇa of Śrāvastī ; he married at an advanced age at the request of his friends. His young wife thought the old man intolerable. To satisfy her wicked cravings, she wanted to have him away from home, and induced him to travel from court to court in quest of alms. The Brāhmaṇa collected a large amount of money ; but he was robbed of all he had got by a gang of thieves on his way home. He was lamenting over his loss when Lord Bhūtabhāvana gave him a treasure with which he returned to his wife. Finding her not satisfied still, he renounced the world, and soon obtained the rank of an Arhat. The Lord related the story of Mahendra Sena to explain the merits of Jivaśarmā.

LXXX.—Supriya and Subhadra. Lord Buddha, while lying on his death-bed at Kuśī, remembered two persons who were greatly puffed up with vanity. He resolved on humbling them. One was Supriya, a king of the Gandharvas, who, being requested by Indra to accompany him on a philanthropic journey, told him, "I cannot go because I have to play on my flute." To humble him Buddha employed a master musician created by himself. Unable to surpass this man, Supriya humbly prayed the Lord, and obtained the highest bliss from the Lord's instruction.

The Lord said, "this Supriya was a worshipper of Kāśyapa who performed a Samādhi with a view to be the king of the Gandharvas. The other supremely vain man was Subhadra, a Yati, who, seeing a fig tree covered with blossoms, thought the blossoms proceeded from the merits of his good works. When the blossoms withered, he thought it was from his own sinfulness. But the nymph who dwelt on the fig tree said, 'It is neither from your merit nor from your sin that the blossoms have grown and withered, but for the birth and death of a Buddha in the vicinity.'" Subhadra, humbled in his pride, proceeded to the dying Buddha, became his disciple, and died before him.

The Lord said, Subhadra had been in his previous existence Aśoka, a disciple of Kāśyapa, who prayed for dying before the eyes of his spiritual guide.

The Lord said, "We never feel any pain in doing things liked by others. There was in days of yore a king named Vijayanta in the city of Ajitodaya. His subjects were all virtuous men. They filled the heaven by proceeding thither in crowds after death. Indra, to test the virtue of the king sent a cruel beggar to him. This relentless man asked bits of flesh from the king's body. The king granting, he went on asking continually till the king was literally reduced to a skeleton."

LXXXI.—Hetūpama Avadāna. See Aśoka Avadāna, ante, p. 14.

LXXXII.—Bhavasarmā Avadāna. See Aśoka Avadāna, ante, p. 14.

LXXXIII.—Chandra Sūrya Avadāna. Suddhodana once asked Buddha why was it, that Rāhula remained for six years in the womb ; and why was Yaśodharā so long oppressed with the heavy load ? The Lord replied, "a king of Mithilā had two sons, Chandra and Sūrya. Sūrya, the eldest, renounced the world. One day he drank water from a rishi's water-pot without his permission. But immediately after he repented of his using the property of another person without his consent, and went directly to king Chandra to obtain instruction as to the proper course of expiation. Chandra made him tarry at his capital for six days and then gave the proper instructions, after consulting with the Brāhmaṇs of his court. I was that Sūrya, and my son Rāhula was the king Chandra. A milkmaid went to sell butter-milk in company with her young daughter. The daughter gave the heavier vessel to her own mother, and took the light one herself. The daughter is now Yaśodharā who feels the consequence of her selfishness.”*

LXXXIV.—Madhurasvarā Avadāna. See Aśoka Avadāna, ante, p. 15.

LXXXV.—Upananda and Kuhana. The Bhikshus asked the Lord why was the Lord so fond of the diseased. The Lord said, there were no pains more unbearable than those that affect the body.

Sivi, king of Sikhi-ghosha, had a charitable dispensary. A patient sought relief thereat. The physicians in the king's employ advised him to use the blood of one who had never been angry since his birth. The king, considering himself to be such a one, gave his own blood, and the patient recovered in six months. Once on a time, the king's son felt unwell. The physicians prescribed for him a butter named sarvasāra, the ingredients of which should be the extracts from every drug known, and especially from the nerves of a bird called Jivanjiva. It had to be prepared in twelve years, and by boiling the ingredients four thousand times. The drug was prepared, but no sooner had the king's son raised the cup of butter to his mouth, than a Pratyeka Buddha, who had been suffering from the same disease, demanded it of him. The king's son immediately relinquished the cup ; but he was cured by the healing power of the holy man.

The Lord said, “That king's son was myself.” The Bhikshus asked, why did those two suffer from the same disease ? The Lord replied, “Upananda the younger son of Brahmadata of Benares conspired with Kuhana, the younger brother of the royal priest, to deprive the heir-apparent Nanda of a limb. He succeeded, but afterwards repenting restored the kingdom to his brother. Upananda and Kuhana raised several Vihāras before their death. Upananda was Sivi's son, and Kuhana was the Pratyeka Buddha.”

LXXXVI.—Kalinja-śaśaka Avadāna. Some Bhikshus asked the Lord what claims an elder person had to the veneration of a younger. The Lord said during the reign of Brahmadata there lived at Benares four animals ; a francoline partridge, a hare, a monkey and an elephant, who all honoured an elderly banyan tree. On account of the merits of this good work there was always abundance of rain and plenty of every thing. “I am, oh Bhikshus, that partridge, Sāriputra, is the hare, Maudgalāyana is that monkey, and Ananda is the elephant.”

* The story has been given at length in the Rev. S. Beal's translation of the oldest Chinese version of the legend of Śākyā Buddha, ꠘp. 361 et seq.

LXXXVII.—Padmaka Avadāna. See Aśoka Avadāna, ante, p. 15.

LXXXVIII.—Chitra Avadāna. Chitra, the son of Bimbisāra, king of Rājagriha, became a Bhikshu at an early age. But his wife managed to bring him back to his house. When Lord Buddha came to hear of this, he appeared before Chitra and dispelled the darkness from his mind. In a short time Chitra became an Arhat. The Lord said, "Chitra in one of his previous existences was similarly deceived by his wife ; he was in that existence Hariśikha, the son of a priest to the king Brahmadatta. Hariśikha entered a monastery in company with his elder brother Harihāyana. He subsequently fell in love with Lāvanyavati, the daughter of a king. The lady spared no pains to ingratiate herself in Hariśikha's favor, and was successful. Harihāyana, deeply mortified at this sudden change in his brother, came to him and led him back to the monastery. I am that Harihāyana, and Chitra is Hariśikha."

LXXXIX.—Dharmaruchi or Timingila Avadāna. Some merchants of Śrāvastī were returning from a prosperous voyage, when they fell within the tremendous jaws of a whale (timingila) of huge bulk. In utter helplessness they cried, "salutation to Buddha, salutation to Buddha, salutation to Buddha," and they were saved. They obtained Arhatship by worshipping Lord Buddha who then resided at Śrāvastī. Beholding the miraculous deliverance of the merchant's ship, the whale ceased to be a carnivorous animal, and died from want of proper food. The Nāgas, unable to bear the putrid smell of the whale's carcass, threw it upon the sea-shore, where the bones formed a hill of no small height.

After the death of the whale its soul was born in the family of a Brāhmaṇ, and was named Dharmaruchi. The new-born babe was so voracious that his hunger could not be appeased with the milk of a hundred women. When grown up, he became a Bhikshu with the sole object of getting plenty of food. But his appetite was nowhere satisfied. One day he ate up alone a feast prepared for a whole Buddhist congregation (sangha). The host, alarmed at his voraciousness, fled with his family to where Lord Buddha dwelt. The Lord said, "fear not ; he is neither a Yaksha, nor a Rākshasa ; he is Dharmaruchi, a Bhikshu destined one day to obtain Arhatship." The Lord then took Dharmaruchi to the above mentioned bone-hill, and reminded him of his doings in his previous existence, which excited in his mind a feeling of resignation. He obtained Arhatship from the Lord Buddha.

The Bhikshus asked the Lord what were the merits that raised Dharmaruchi to such an eminence. The Lord said, "in a previous kalpa, there was a patriarch, Dharmasīla by name. He raised a stūpa in honor of Khemaṅkara, a Buddha, in spite of strong opposition from an anti-buddhist party. He had for his ally only one man, named, Sahasrayodhi. I am that patriarch Dharmasīla, and Sahasrayodhi is Dharmaruchi. In another kalpa two Brāhmaṇa brothers, Mati and Sumati, appeared at the sacrifice of Vāsava, king of Benares. They obtained whatever they sought from the king. The king's daughter, named Sundarī became enamoured of Sumati ; but her suit was rejected by the stern Brāhmaṇa. Thus deeply mortified, she resigned the world, and became a Bhikṣuṇī. Sumati dreamt a strange dream, for the explanation of which he repaired, by the advice of rishi Parṇadā, to Lord Dvīpankara, who lived at Dvīpavātī. There he met Sundarī and asked flowers from her. When offering him the flowers Sundarī prayed that he be her husband in the next existence. Sumati fell prostrate before the lord with his clotted hair scattered all over the ground. Lord Dvīpankara trod them down, exclaiming, 'you shall become a great Buddha, Śākyamuni by name.' Mati, who was standing by, felt his Brāhmaṇic pride scandalized by the unbrāhmaṇy conduct of his brother ; but Sumati induced him to revere the Lord. I am that Sumati, Yaśodharā is Sundarī, and Mati is Dharmaruchi."

In another kalpa, during the advent of Krakuchchanda, a great Buddha, there lived, at Ujjayinī, a merchant's wife, named Kāmabalā. During her husband's absence she accepted her son Aśvadatta for her paramour, and poisoned her husband on his return home. To evade punishment she fled with her son to some foreign country, where Aśvadatta finding her in the embrace of another, put a period to her guilty existence. Aśvadatta afterwards became a Buddhist, and was fond of repeating the formula 'namo buddhāya, namo buddhāya.' Aśvadatta is the same person as Dharmaruchi.

XC.—Dhanika Avadāna. The Brāhmaṇs of Vaiśālī passed a decree, banishing from the town every one who invited Buddha to his house. The householder Dhanika, unmindful of the decree, invited Buddha who had been dwelling at Kūṭāgāra by the side of lake Markaṭa. Dhanika, his wife, his son, and his daughter-in-law were all staunch Buddhists. They feasted him for four days. When the Brāhmaṇs tried to enforce their decree, Dhanika succeeded in appeasing them.

The Lord said, "During a terrible famine, Dhanika, in his previous existence, had granted the only piece of cloth his family had to a Pratyeka Buddha, and hence his prosperity and influence."

XCI.—Subhāshitā Avadāna. The great city of Kuśī was cele brated for its Gymnasium. The athletes of the place had all been converted and raised to the rank of Arhats by Lord Buddha. They were very fond of religious talk. The Lord was one day greatly delighted by their conversation. He said, he was, in all his previous existences fond of religious discourse. In course of one of these, he gave his own flesh to a Rākshasa for a moral saying. The monster at last proved to be Indra in disguise, come to test his character. The purport of the saying was, that all the impressions of the human mind are momentary like the flash of lightning.

XCII.—Maitrakanyaka Avadāna, vide Avadāna Śataka.

XCIII.—Sumāgadadhā Avadāna. Sumāgadadhā, daughter of Anāthapiṇḍada, was married to a person at Paunḍravardhana. Her father-in-law, on one occasion, invited some Jinas to his house. They were all naked, and without the least sense of propriety. Shocked at their complete nudity and their want of good breeding, Sumāgadadhā exclaimed, "Oh how infinitely superior is our Lord to these boorish wretches." On her mother-in-law expressing a desire to see the Lord, Sumāgadadhā, ascending the highest roof of the house, worshipped Buddha with flowers and incense. The flowers fell at the Lord's feet at the Jatavana grove. Through his omniscience the Lord knew from what direction the flowers had come. Instantly he presented himself at Paunḍravardhana, where he was received with the highest honor.

"Sumāgadadhā once was," said the Lord, "Kānchanamālā, the daughter of Kriki ; she had accepted the ascetic condition with five hundred handmaids under the instructions of Kāśyapa."

In another existence she honored a stūpa with a garland of orange flowers.

XCIV.—Yaśomitra or Sundara Avadāna. Yaśomitra, son of Puṇyamitra, had a fountain of pure limpid water at the root of each of his incisor teeth, so he was perfectly ignorant of what thirst was.

The Bhikshus enquiring after the origin of this strange phenomenon, the Lord replied : "Sundara, son of a banker of Benares, acting under the instruction of Lord Kāśyapa, became a hermit. Suffering intensely from thirst he could not anywhere find water ; wells, tanks and even rivers dried up at his sight. When he was on the point of death for want of water, Lord Kāśyapa, compassionately filled his vessel up, and made its content inexhaustable. The Lord took a palmful of water from the waterpot, which conferred so great a merit on Sundara that he never lost his supply of water."

XCV.—Sanku-Sandhidatta Avadāna. Sanku and Sandhidatta, two brothers, lost their father Arthadatta, a merchant of Rājagriha, when they were very young. Their mother brought them up with great difficulty, and, when they grew up, employed them in pilfering. The thieves were detected by the vigilant police of Ajātasatru, and sentenced capitally. At the place of their execution Buddha interposed in their favor, rescued them from the gallows, and carried them to his hermitage, where they soon rose to the exalted rank of Arhats.

The Lord said, "In one of their former existences, they were the cubs of a hungry tigress from whose jaws I preserved their lives by offering my own."

XCVI.—Kunjara Avadāna. King Udayana of Avanti was taking a walk in one of his gardens with five hundred of his wives, when five hundred holy men entered the garden to gather flowers. Some of them cast sidelong glances at the royal wives. The king took umbrage at their conduct, and ordered their hands and legs to be cut off. The order was instantly executed. The holy men screamed loudly from excruciating pain. Buddha, who was near, heard their groans with compassion, and looked at them with an eye of grace. They got their legs and hands back by a miracle.

The Lord said "Five hundred ministers of Brahmadata, king of Benares, afraid of the effects of the king's anger at their neglect of duty, fled through the desert. They were entertained with water and fruits by an elephant which lived there. They settled in the neighbourhood of the elephant's dwelling, and, when it died, gave it a grand funeral. I am that elephant."

XCVII.—Kachchhapa Avadāna. When the Lord lived at the Venuvana grove at Rājagriha, the envious Devadatta sent five hundred well-armed hermits to put an end to Buddha's existence. They all made the Lord their aim at one and the same time. Thousands of weapons were simultaneously poured on him from all quarters. But in passing through space these were transformed into so many garlands of sweet-scented flowers. The hermits on their knees begged his pardon, which was instantly granted. They gradually rose to the rank of Arhats.

The Lord said, "These hermits had been, in one of their previous existences, merchants at Benares. On a sea voyage their ships had all wrecked. But they were all saved by myself in the shape of a tortoise. But when I was fast asleep they wanted to eat my flesh. I awaked, and, having found them extremely hungry, offered them my own body and obtained the highest merit."

XCVIII.—Kuśalaśīla Avadāna. The Lord entertained a large number of famine-stricken hungry athletes, converted them to his own faith, and raised them to the rank of Arhats.

He said "The athletes of Koṭā obtained the highest knowledge from the preaching of Kuśalaśīla, a hermit. I am that holy hermit."

XCIX.—Padmaka Avadāna. To be found in the Aśoka Avadāna, ante, p. 15.

C.—Prabhāsa Avadāna. Prasenajit, king of Kośala, asked the Lord, saying, "O Lord, tell me truly in what existence did the desire for Sambodhi first arise in your mind?"

The Lord replied, "When I was Prabhāsa, king of Prabhāvati, I had an elephant who went to the forest out of his love to a female consort, and returned to my stable again. My elephant-driver, who was very proud of his skill in training elephants, boasted before me, saying, 'Sire, you see my skill, the elephant comes to the stable again.' I asked him, 'Was there any man who was superior to all temptations?' He said, 'Yes, there are Tathāgatas. It is by their glory that the earth is enlightened.' From that day I felt a craving for Bodhi knowledge."

CI.—Syāmāka Avadāna.

CII.—Siñha-kunjara Avadāna. One evening the Lord was conversing familiarly with all his Bhikshus at the Jetavana grove. The conversation turned on an inquiry about the origin of philanthropy. Is it a natural propensity, the result of accumulated deeds of merit, or of constant practice? The Lord said, "even ferocious animals, like lions, are susceptible to that feeling. For instance, a company of merchants were on the point of being devoured by a large venomous serpent, on the seashore. They screamed aloud at the prospect of instant death; their screams were heard by a lion and an elephant. They fell from a high hill on the serpent and crushed him to death. But they themselves lost their lives from the poisonous breath of the dying reptile. I am that lion, Sāriputra is the elephant, and Devadatta is the reptile."

CIII.—Priyapiṇḍa Avadāna. Priyapiṇḍa, son of Vajrapīṇḍa, king of Vajravati, by Rohinī, daughter of Meru, king of Gangādhīpatya, was born with a grand jewelled parasol over his head. On his coming to the throne he gave away his whole property for the good of the animal creation. Durmati, his minister, to get the throne for himself, instigated Meru, maternal grandfather to the king, to war. Always averse to bloodshed, Priyapiṇḍa proceeded to his grandfather's capital to appease him. There by his own fiat he created a rich banquet for all his men. At this the grandfather thought him to be a god, and honored him as such.

The Lord said, "Priyapiṇḍa had been in a former life, Mulika, a physician practising at Benares; he had cured a Pratyeka Buddha of a mortal disease, and given him a painted umbrella. I am that Priyapiṇḍa, and Devadatta is that wicked Durmati."

CIV.—Saśaka Avadāna. See p. 50.

CV.—Raivataka Avadāna. Raivataka, a bhikshu of Śāila Vihāra at Kāśmīra, was boiling water in order to dye his cloth at a retired spot, when there came in a Brāhmaṇa who had lost his cow. He asked the Bhikshu what was he about. On receiving the Bhikshu's reply the Brāhmaṇa came to the boiling vessel, and to the utter ruin of the Bhikshu found it full of blood and beef. The Brāhmaṇa brought a criminal suit against the Bhikshu, who was sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment for theft. On his release, at the expiration of the term, he gave the following explanation of his suffering. He was, in a previous existence, a cattle-lifter; once on a time having stolen and killed a cow, he has pointed to a Pratyeka Buddha as the real culprit; he suffered imprisonment for that sin.

CVI.—Kaṇakavarṇā Avadāna. Kaṇaka was king of the city of Kāṇakavati. A minister's son was found guilty of carrying on an intrigue with the king's daughter, Kaṇakavarṇā. They were both ordered by the king to the place of execution. But the king's son, Kaṇakavarmā, who was very fond of his sister, exerted in their favour, and succeeded in sending them away from Kāṇakavati. The king enraged at the disobedience of his son, banished him from the city. The banished prince travelled through various cities, and arrived at last at the deserted city where his sister dwelt. Being apprised that the city was depopulated by the destructive ravages of 60,000 Yakshas, he destroyed them all single-handed (except one that sought his protection), took the administration of the city in his own hands, and appointed the minister's banished son as his prime minister. The Lord said, "I am that Prince."

CVII.—Suddhodana Avadāna. Suddhodana, a merchant of Benares, received the benefit of hearing a good saying at the sacrifice of all his wealth which he bestowed on Bālasarasvatī, the daughter of Brahmadatta. The Lord was that Suddhodana, who was the speaker of it.

CVIII.—Jimūtavāhana Avadāna. Jimūtakeṭu, the king of Kānchanapura, according to the custom of ancient Hindu Rājās, abdicated the throne in favour of his son Jīmūtavāhana, and proceeded to the mount Malaya to seek salvation. His son used to go there to pay his respect to his old father. One day he found on the mount a beautiful girl, whom he married. She was the daughter of Viśvavasu, king of the Siddhas. The married couple took a long walk in the hills, when they suddenly met a female Nāga sobbing aloud. According to an agreement with Garuḍa, her son was that day to offer himself up as food to that bird-king. Jīmūtavāhana offered to go in his stead, and soothed the weeping mother's mind. He sat at the place agreed upon, when Garuḍa in a long swoop struck his monstrous bill on the crown of the prince's head. His wife, supposing him dead, kindled a funeral pyre, and exclaimed when on the point of ascending it, "O Haravallabhā, (the favourite of Hara) you promised me a bridegroom who was to have empire over the Vidyādharas. But you see my widowhood commences before a week is past, after our happy union, How can the words of a chaste one like thee be false?" Instantly Haravallabhā sent a nectareous shower and resuscitated Jīmūtavāhana. This story has been dramatised in the Nāgānanda of Śrīharsha.

An episode in the story of the wars between the gods and the demons, in which a girl named Ānandā, deputed by the Lord Buddha, overcame many she-demons. By Nathamala alias Nāthurāma Brahma-chārī. In the portion of the earth called Ilāvṛata-khaṇḍa there reigned a powerful king of the demons, Buddha by name. He had eleven great marshals. The gods trembled at his name. Once on a time, the gods and the demons had an encounter in the way leading to the southern country. After the slaughter of many thousand demons, Brahmā ordered Viśvakarmā to prepare a battle-field at the foot of the Himālaya, and requested Sūrasena, king of Udyota, to come to his aid. Sūrasena came with a well-appointed army led by his sons Jayasena and Kālasena. There were several battles fought, in many of which the female demons took part. Lord Buddha sent a girl, named Ānandā, who vanquished the heroines on the side of the Daityas. The book ends with the description of the heroic achievements of Gangā on the Buddhist, and Raktabhakshā on the enemy's side.

DAŚABHŪMIŚVARA.

A treatise on the ten different stages which a person must pass through, before he can attain Buddhahood. These stages are technically called Bhūmis, and thence the codex derives its specific name. It forms one of the nine Dharmas or sacred scriptures of the Nepalese Buddhists, and is held in high esteem. It must also be of considerable antiquity as it was carried to China at an early age. It was translated into Chinese under the name of Shi-chu-king, by Kumārajīva and another.

Like most of the Mahāyāna Sūtras, it is narrative in form, and professes to have been related by Buddha himself. The scene is laid in the heaven of Indra, where the Lord was residing amidst the gods, who were very obedient to him in the expectation of obtaining the highest bliss through his favour. During the second week of his residence in the celestial palace, in company of the recently converted Devarāja and a large company of Bodhisattvas, one of the latter, Vajragarbha by name, performed, by his permission, the meditation named Mahāyānaprabhāva, or 'the glory of the great Translation.' Ten Buddhas, resplendent in brilliant beams of light, manifested their divine presence on all sides of Vajragarbha by their superhuman power. They touched Vajragarbha with their hands without stirring from their seats. This touch interrupted the meditations of the Bodhisattva. On awaking he enumerated the names of the ten Bhūmis or progressive conditions of Bodhisattvas. Viz., Pramuditā, Vimalā, Prabhākārī, Archishmatī, Sudurjayā, Abhimukhī, Dūraṅgamā, Achalā, Sādhumatī and Dharmamedhyā. He then addressed the Buddhas, saying, "O sons of Jinas, you know all the stages of knowledge of the Buddhas, past, present and future." At the mention of the ten Bhūmis the curiosity of the other Bodhisattvas was awakened, and they solicited, through Muktichandra as their mouthpiece, an account of what those Bhūmis were. Vajragarbha replied, "a person of honest resolution should expel from his mind all doubts and disbelief by his unswerving devotion to hundreds of thousands and millions of Buddhas." He was proceeding further, when rays of light issued forth from the pores of Buddha's body, brightly illuminating the persons and seats of the Devas, Buddhas and others. Vajragarbha then continued : "the condition in which a person meditates upon the Lord of religion, the immeasurable Buddha pervading all space, formed of the essence of Dharma, introducer of all knowledge and wisdom, is called Pramuditā. He who enters this stage rises superior to all the rules that bind Bodhisattvas, and elevates himself far above ordinary men. He is taken in the family of Tathāgatas, and is not contaminated by his intercourse with people of any low caste." The mental tendencies which are characteristic of this Bhūmi are—disinterested mercy, disinterested love for created beings, charity, resignation, knowledge of the Śāstras, knowledge of the world, suppression of fear, patience, worship of Buddha and devotion to him. These are the ten Dharmas or qualities attainable in this stage.

He who has acquired all these qualities becomes desirous of rising up to the stage called Vimalā. The characteristics of this stage are,—desire for simplicity, for tender-heartedness, for activity, for consulting others for equality, for doing good, for purity, for impartiality, for large-heartedness and for magnanimity. These are generically called the ten Āsayas or 'desires,' and they tend to show him the way to good works.

When these desires are well established and purified, men rise to the third stage called Prabhākari. The mental condition of the person who has attained this stage is characterised by ten tendencies or chittāsaya-namaskārāḥ. These are : 1, purity of mind ; 2, tranquillity of mind ; 3, faith ; 4, immovableness of mind ; 5, firmness ; 6, ardency of mind ; 7, retentiveness of mind ; 8, frankness of mind ; 9, magnanimity of mind (the tenth is omitted). In this stage men have their essence purified and their heart freed from grief.

In the next, the 4th stage, or that of Archishmatī, the aspirant to perfection is enlightened by ten different sorts of religious lights, viz., (1), the light that shows the movements or workings of existence ; (2), that which shows the movements of regions ; (3), that which shows the movements or workings of qualities ; (4), that which shows the working of Ākāśa or space ; (5), that which shows the movements of cognition ; (6), that which shows the movements of desire ; (7), that which shows the movements of form ; (8), that which shows the movements of formlessness ; (9), that which shows the movements which lead to separation from all ambition ; (10), that which shows the movements that lead to separation from magnanimity. When he has acquired these lights, he acquires ten different powers which are calculated to fit him for the reception of true knowledge. These are : (1), the desire of remaining undistinguishable ; (2), the vision of the three jewels and their equal favor ; (3), the thought of the rise and cessation of the impressions ; (4), the thought of the non-creation of nature ; (5), the thought of men's inclinations ; (6), the thought of the performance of work ; (7), the thought of the annihilation of the world ; (8), the thought of works under all circumstances ; (9), the thought of the beginning and the end ; (10), the thought of non-existence.

From this stage the devotee passes to the fifth or Durjayā stage. In this he acquires the ten-fold purifications of his mind. (Chittāsaya-vissuddhimatā.) These are : (1), the purity of the past of Buddhadharma ; (2), that of the future of the same ; (3), that of the present of the same ; (4), that of the discipline ; (5), that of the mind ; (6), that of sight ; (7), that of means proper and improper ; (8), that of imagination ; (9), that of reflection of the future of true knowledge ; (10), that of capacity for assimilating the truth. In this stage a Bodhisattva obtains a variety of transcendental powers, and his memory, his judgment, his modesty and his patience all become strengthened.

The sixth stage is called Abhimukhī. In this stage the devotee acquires the idea of ten religious equalities, namely : (1), equality in the causes of all Dharmas ; (2), equality in the definition of all Dharmas ; (3), equality of the non-origin of all Dharmas ; (4), equality in all Dharmas ; (5), equality in the diversion of all Dharmas ; (6), equality in the purity of all Dharmas ; (7), equality in the absoluteness of all Dharmas ; (8), that of Niryuha ; (9), equality in the reflection of these Dharmas in one another, like the reflection of the moon in transparent water ; (10), equality in the lustre of two different Dharmas. In this stage man acquires the power of discrimination, or the power of judging things aright, understands the world to be mere delusion, and alleviates the mundane pains of himself and others.

Dūraṅgamā is the seventh stage. In this stage the man acquires the power of chalking out a way for acquiring Bodhi knowledge by wisdom and other means. Under no circumstance does his mind go astray from the right path. He devotes his whole soul to Tathāgata.

The eighth stage is Achalā. One well established in this stage, understands all truths about physical organization.

In the ninth or Sādhumatī stage a man can look through the minds of others. He always has goodness in a bodily form by him, and Lord Buddha presents himself before the vision of his mental eye.

A Bodhisattva, having received the full development attainable in the ninth stage, invades the tenth or Dharmamedhyā bhūmi. When he has performed, to his complete satisfaction, all the duties of this stage, he becomes endowed with manifold attributes of wonderful power. These ten stages of perfection are similar to the four stages of the Vaishnavas and the Sufis.

A collection of twenty-two stories illustrating the merits of devotion to Buddhism and to the duties enjoined by it. The author's name is not given ; but from the form of salutation at the beginning of the work, it is evident that the work is accepted by the Buddhists to be due to a private person. The codex professes to be complete ; but owing to errors in numbering the stories, or some other cause, only nineteen stories have been found in it. The scene is laid at the Kukkuṭa Vihāra near Rājagriha, where Aśoka expressed a wish to hear the stories, and his spiritual instructor, Upagupta, narrated them, alleging them to have been originally related at that place by Buddha himself to his disciples.

I. — Ratnavyūha Avadāna. The first story is intended to illustrate the merit of devoting money for the repairs of Buddhist monuments.

While the Lord was lecturing his disciples on the merits of alms-giving, in came a prince named Ratnavyūha, dazzling the eyes of the beholders by the splendour of his jewels. After paying his respects to the Lord, he departed. The Bhikshus enquired what were the high merits which had raised the visitor to such a dizzy eminence ?

The Lord said in one of his previous existences the Rājā was a boatman. But he repaired a broken dilapidated stūpa situated at the village of Kuśī in the country of Malla, and from the merit thereof had been born a prince and owner of profuse wealth.

II. — Śāntamatī Avadāna. The second story (numbered IV in the codex) illustrates the merits of charity.

To show a miracle, Buddha produced a heavenly light from his woollen garment. The light delighted a banker so much that he immediately gathered some flowers, and threw them over the Lord's head. These formed a splendid parasol. The Śreshṭhī, dying in a short time, was born in the heaven of Indra. There he remembered what had made him a Devaputra ; he descended on earth, worshipped Buddha, heard his discourses, acquired the Bodhi knowledge, and obtained nirvāṇa. The Bhikshu asked what was the cause of this banker's speedy elevation. The Lord said, "Śāntamatī, a poor banker of Kuśī, always attended the lectures of the Buddhist preachers. One day he gave his own food (having nothing else to spare) to a Bhikshu. The Bhikshu's benediction was, that he should be a rich man and a sincere Buddhist. In a month, while pouring water on a neighbouring stūpa, he found that he was pouring hot water and rubies and diamonds ; he went to the ghāt whence he had drawn the water, and found there a heap of jewels. He took them up, but instead of enjoying them, devoted them to charity, and always prayed for nirvāṇa. This Śāntamatī," added the Lord, "was the present banker who obtained the summum bonum of Buddhist faith."

III.—Uttīrṇa Avadāna. A merchant, named Uttīrṇa died in a shipwreck. He went to heaven, and there became a Devaputra. His young wife prayed the Lord to show her in a dream where her husband then was. In a dream her husband appeared before her, and informed her what had happened. She kept a fast for eight days in a "love-circle" (प्रणयमण्डल), and, after death, was transformed into a Devakanyā. She lived in peace with her husband.

The Bhikshus enquired what had raised the couple so high? The Lord gave the following history of their previous existence: "King Prādeśika-maṇḍalina was taught in the doctrine of Ahiṅsā, or non-injury to created beings, by Dharmaruchi, a Rishi, but, forgetting his precepts, Prādeśika killed a hind. The animal cursed him saying that he should die in a shipwreck. Uttīrṇa is that cursed king."

IV.—Kshatriyarāja Avadāna. One day while Buddha was preaching, Indra came down to worship him. The Bhikshus asked why should the king of the Devas honor a mortal? Buddha replied, "In one of my transmigrations I was a Kshatriya king; I honored Kshemaṅkara in every way, and erected a large stūpa to his honor, and hence my greatness."

V.—Dhātustejā Avadāna. Dhātustejā, son of Dharmakalpa, a king of Dakṣiṇāpatha, came to visit the Lord, and was immediately sanctified. The Bhikshus enquired what the youth had done to deserve such honor. The Lord said: "In the 91st kalpa, Lord Vipāśyī lived in the metropolis of king Bandhumatī. When the lord departed from this world, the king caused to be erected on his remains a stūpa, a mile high, and a merchant's son decorated it with jewels. That king is now Dharmakalpa, and the merchant's son is the prince."

VI.—Chandraprabha Avadāna. Chandraprabha, coming by the aerial way, asked the Lord how the series of transmigrations can be put a stop to. Receiving the proper answer from Buddha, he returned home. The resplendent brightness of Chandraprabha's person struck the beholders with wonder; they became inquisitive about the cause of his good fortune. His merit consisted in bestowing a golden circle in the Great Vihāra of Vipāśyī, who flourished in the 91st kalpa in the metropolis of king Bandhumatī. That grantor of the golden circle was subsequently born in the Kuru family and named Chandraprabha.

VII.—Divyānanda Avadāna. While Buddha was residing at Rājagriha, a householder invited him, feasted him, honored him, and desired Buddhahood from him. Buddha complied with his request. "I was that householder."

VIII.—Purṇa Avadāna. The Bhikshus asked “O Lord, in what way did you get this power of working miracles ?” Lord said, “As a Kshatriya king I feasted Buddha Purṇa for three months. That piece of good work has made me great.”

IX.—Dvārikā Avadāna. While Kāśyapa preached at Benares, a girl, being asked for pure water, gave to eight Bhikshus a quantity of delicious sherbet. She was borne to heaven, where she never feels thirsty.

X.—Śukla Avadāna.

XI.—Śreshṭhikanyā Avadāna.

XII.—Mātsaryayukta Avadāna. A troop of Brāhmaṇs, having made their obeisance to Buddha, expressed their desire to enter Pra-vrajyā or itinerancy. Instantly all were, by a miracle, shaved, and their clothes transformed into rags, except one who remained as he was. The Lord said, the cause of this exception was, that the person was full of Brāhmaṇic pride. On his solicitations, the Lord changed his clothes into rags, but these rags were all dirty. Being asked the cause of this, the Lord said, “That Brāhmaṇ, in one of his former existences, did not make his obeisance to Buddha Padmottara, disdaining to bow to a Śramaṇa.”

XIII.—Vihāra Avadāna. During Buddha’s lifetime, the inhabitants of the city of Vihāra were noted for their profligacy. Buddha sent some of his Bhikshus to chant a gāthā there. This simple expedient cured the citizens of their shameful immorality.

XIV.—Kushṭhi Avadāna. A leper, without hands and without feet, circumambulated the famous stūpa of Vipāśyī several times. He was restored to his former health and vigour. A voice from heaven then recited the following :

“He sat before the stūpa of Vipāśyī, covered his body with a heap of white cloth, plastered his body with all sorts of perfumes, and then set the whole on fire ; the merit of his great deed raised him to the rank of a Pratyeka Buddha in one existence ; in another he obtained nirvāṇa.”

XV.—Surendradamana Avadāna.

XVI.—Suvarṇābha Avadāna.

XVII.—Vapusmatah Avadāna.

XVIII.—Chandana Avadāna.

XIX.—Surūpa Avadāna.

Substance, Nepalese yellow paper, 7½×3. Folia, 2. Lines on a page, 5. Extent in ślokas, 10. Character, Newāri. Date, ? Prose. Incorrect.

Mantras for an amulet in praise of Gaṇapati. The mantras are alleged to have been disclosed to Ānanda by Buddha himself when sojourning at Rājagriha. Whoever wears or recites them, or hears them recited, attains whatever he wishes. The mantras are of the usual mystic character common in Tāntric works. They include such phrases as Om namastu te Gaṇapataye svāhāh, Om Gaṇapataye svāhāh &c. The most remarkable fact in connexion with this little work is the proof it affords of the Buddhists having adopted the adoration of Gaṇeśa, a purely Hindu deity.

The history of Sudhana in search of the perfect knowledge. The work is reckoned as one of the nine principal scriptures of the Buddhists, and held in high esteem. It was taken to China in the 7th century, and was translated into the Chinese language by Amoghavajra during the reign of the Tang dynasty. Its Chinese name is Ta-shing-mi-yen-king.

Once upon a time, while residing with Samantabhadra, Mañjuśrī and others, lord Buddha showed them the marvellous workings of a certain mystic position called Sīṅhavijrīmbhita. As soon as the lord assumed that meditative position, the interior of the room expanded to an indefinite extent, the floor became thickly studded with sapphires and other precious stones, and gigantic pillars of solid emeralds supported the roof. A Bodhisattva, named Rāśmiprabha, decorated the sky with clouds of various kinds, some showing heavenly flora, some raining nectarous perfumes.

Then Sāriputra, approaching Manjuśrī, made him acquainted with the presence of a host of holy Bhikshus. With them Manjuśrī started on a journey to the southern regions, and settled himself in a grove where stood the Vihāra of Māladhvajavyūha, where he had formerly held his meditations. On this the people of the neighbouring town of Danyakāra came in crowds to receive his instruction and his benediction. The lord taught them, and singled out one young man to be the object of his special favour. This young man was named Sudhana from the fact that immediately after his birth his father had suddenly become very rich. Manjuśrī narrated to him the marvellous deeds of Lord Buddha. Sudhana chanted the praise of Manjuśrī in sweet and melodious verses, and declared himself a candidate for Bodhi knowledge.¹

Manjuśrī advised him to have the benefit of instruction from Meghaśrī, who resided at Mount Sugrīva in the country called Rāmavarta. Meghaśrī shifted the burden of instructing Sudhana to Sāgaramegha of Sāgaramukha, who on his turn advised Sudhana to repair to Supratisthita of Sāgara on the way to Lankā. Sudhana was again disappointed. He was directed to proceed to Vajapura, a city of Draviḍa, to receive instructions from a Drāvidian named Megha. Megha professed his ignorance of Bodhi knowledge.

By his advise Sudhana repaired to Sāradvaja at Milanapuraṇa, the land's end of Jambudvīpa; thence to the Bhikṣuṇī Āśā, the wife of Suprabha of Samudravelati to the east of Mahāprabhu; thence to Bhishmottarasānghesha of Nalapūra; thence to Jayashīnāyatana in the country of Īśasha; thence to Maitrāyanī, the daughter of Siṅhaketu, at the city of Siṅhavijrimbhita; thence to Sudarśana of Trinānjana; thence to a boy named Indriyaśvara of the city of Sumukha in the country called Śramaṇa Maṇḍala; thence to the Upāsika Prabhūta of Samudraprasthāna; thence to the patriarch Vidvan of Mahāsambhava; thence to the banker Ratnachūḍa of Siṅhapotī; thence to Samantanetra, a manufacturer of perfumery, at the city of Samantamukha in Mūlaka; thence to Nala of Nāladhvaja; thence to the king Mahāprabha of Suprabha; thence to the Upāsikā Achalasthirā; thence to Sarvagrama of Toshala in Mitatoshala; thence to Utpalabhūti in Prithurāshṭra; thence to the slave of Paisa of Kulāgāra; thence to the banker Jayottama of Nānuhara; thence to the Bhikṣuṇī Siṅhavyasambhitā of Kalingavana in Śroṇapasanta; thence to Bhagavati Sumitrā of Ratnabhijjiha in Durga; thence to the patriarch Veṣṭhila of Subhapārangama; thence to the Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara of Poṭalaka; thence to Ananyagāmī of Pashatmaṇḍala, and finally to Mahādeva of Dvāravati. All the places mentioned above belong to the region called Dakṣiṇāpatha or southern India.

Leaving Dekkan in the south, Sudhana directed his steps by the advice of Mahādeva towards Magadha. In that country he paid his devotion to eight Rātridevatās, or goddesses of night. These had different names, and dwelt in different localities, two of which Kapilavastu and Bidhimāṇḍa are well known in the history of the Buddhist religion.

But none could afford full satisfaction to Sudhana, and he remained unpossessed of perfect knowledge. He then entreated Gopā, the wife, and Māyā the mother, of the great Buddha for instruction, and here he was partially successful. They recommended him to Surendrābhā at the house of Indra, and she, to a young teacher Viśvāmitra of Kapilavastu. At every change of teacher, the amount of his knowledge increased, and with redoubled zeal he applied himself to the acquisition and perfection of knowledge. He received several valuable lectures from the patriarch Surendra and the goldsmith Muktasāra of Varukutchā, from a Brāhmaṇ Sivrātra of Dharmagrāma in Dekkan, from a boy Śrīsambhava, and a girl Śrīmātī of Sumukha. From Sumukha he travelled to Samudrakatiha where Maitreya told him plainly that none but Manjuśrī himself would be able to make his knowledge perfect. Thus after passing through a hundred austerities he went back to Manjuśrī, who was living in the vicinity of Sumanā. Sudhana, by the favor of Manjuśrī at last obtained full and perfect knowledge from the holy Samantabhadra.*

Mystic mantras for the adoration of the nine planets. The man-tras were disclosed to a congregation of gods by Buddha himself when residing in the Alakavati mansion of Indra. The mantras are of the Tāntric type, full of mystic particles. It is enjoined that, after worshipping the planets in certain mystic diagrams drawn on the floor of a room, the mantras should be recited seven times daily, from the 7th to the 14th of the waxing moon in Kārtika, and the rite should be concluded on the 15th at midnight. The rite insures longevity to ninety-nine years, prevents all evils resulting from adverse planets, and makes the adorer capable of remembering the history of his former existences. This Hindu ritual must be of a comparatively modern date.

GUNAKĀRANḌA-VYŪHA.

गुणकारण्डव्यूहः ।

Substance, paper, 17½ × 5½. Folia, 120. Lines on a page, 8. Extent in ślokas, 4,740. Character, Newārī. Appearance, old. Incorrect.

An account of the character, religious teachings, and miracles of Ārya Avalokiteśvara, a Bodhisattva. Avalokiteśvara refused to enter Buddhahood until all living creatures would be in possession of the Bodhi knowledge. He had a long life. He had seen three or four Buddhas pass through their mundane career during his lifetime. He had been a friend to Vipaśyī, to Śikhi, to Jina, and to Śākya Muni who had held him in high esteem. His principal occupation was to provide salvation to sufferers in hell ; but he felt equally for all. In one of his philanthropic tours he passed through Ceylon or Sīñhala, Benares, and Magadha, granting salvation, and preaching the gospel of Buddha's religion even to worms and insects. Even the gods of heaven were not beyond the range of his benevolence. He granted one Sukunḍala, a poor god, immense wealth, and above all showed him the way to nir-vāṇa by sending him to the Jetavana grove. Reclaiming the wicked, relieving sufferers, providing food for the famine-stricken, curing the diseased, were the daily routine of his duties. He attained to such high distinction by his noble deeds that he was called the Sangha-ratna or the "jewel of the Buddhist Church."

The work opens with a request from Jinaśrī to Jayaśrī, the great preacher of Bodhimaṇḍa at Buddha Gayā, to give an account of the origin of the "three jewels." This most secret and most mysterious subject was first divulged by Upagupta to Aśoka at the Kukkuṭārāma Vihāra in Pāṭaliputra. According to Upagupta, Lord Jina, the destroyer of Māra's pride, is the Buddha-ratna or "Buddha jewel." Others who will hereafter rise to Buddhahood by Bodhi knowledge will likewise be Buddha-ratnas. The all-powerful intelligence that impels men towards Bodhi knowledge is Dharma-ratna or "the jewel of religion." Ārya Avalokiteśvara, the son of Jina, resplendent in his knowledge of Buddhism, and firm in his faith, is the Sangha-ratna or "jewel of the Church." Other Bodhisattvas, and Arhats who revel in the four Brahmas, and have a thorough command over their own selves, are, also jewels of the Church.

Having thus explained the mystic trinity of Buddha, Dharma and Sangha, Upagupta, at the request of Aśoka, instructed him in the practice of Poshadhavrata, and gave an account of the Sangha-ratna in the following manner :

Once on a time Lord Buddha performed an ecstatic meditation named sarvasaṅśodhana or "the purifier of every thing." No sooner he sat in that posture, than golden rays illuminating the whole province were seen proceeding from some unknown region to that place. Suvarṇāvaraṇa Vishkambhī, a saint, struck with wonder at this miracle, asked the Lord, whence did the rays proceed ? The Lord said "from Ārya Avalokiteśvara who, by the command of Jina, is now preaching the doctrine of Nirvāṇa at Avichī, the stygian lake of fire. These rays, after having purified the wretched people of that hell, are come here to enlighten the ignorant and the sinful." At the request of Vishkambhī, the Lord gave several stories illustrating the power and the goodness of Avalokiteśvara.

The Lord said, once on a time when Vipasyī was preaching on earth, Avalokiteśvara shot forth his holy light for the spiritual benefit of the residents of hell. Vipasyī gave an account of the importance of Buddha-ratna. Before the creation of the world, the first Buddha who was pure effulgence of light without a speck, held a samādhi named Lokasanjanana or "creation." Forthwith Śiva, Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Sūrya, Chandra &c. were generated. The first Buddha allotted distinct works of creation to these.

Vishkambhī solicited the Lord to tell him by what samādhi Avalokiteśvara had acquired the power of saving the souls of the sinful. The Lord said "by thousands of samādhis." He said, even he himself was once benefitted by Avalokiteśvara's power of saving men.

The Lord said, "In one of my previous existences, I was Siñhala, son of Siñha, a merchant of the capital of Siñhakalpa. Siñhala led a nauticalexpedition. His vessels were overtaken by a storm, and wrecked off the island called Tāmradvīpa or copper island ; but fortunately no life was lost. By the grace of the Lord to whom Siñhala was very much devoted, the passengers safely reached the shores of Tāmradvīpa. That island was inhabited by Rākshasis, who could assume any form they wished. On seeing the ship-wrecked people, they assumed the charming forms of celestial nymphs, expressed their concern at their distress, accepted them as husbands, and led them home. One night when all were asleep, Siñhala saw the lamp in his room laugh. Siñhala asked the lamp the reason for its laughter. The lamp said, "The nymphs with whom you live here are Rākshasis in disguise. You are in imminent danger for your lives. If you want to save yourselves, there stands a horse named Balāha on the sea-shore ready at your service. Mount on his back, but do not open your eyes until you land safely on the other side of the ocean." Siñhala assembled all his companions, and induced them to follow the lamp's advice. They all mounted the horse. The horse rose to the sky. The Rākshasis, seeing their prey, which they had thought was most secure in their grasp, flying away, raised loud lamentations. Their husbands were touched with pity, opened their eyes contrary to their promise, and dropped down into the ocean, where they were devoured by their wives. Siñhala alone escaped safe. The Rākshasi who had fallen to his lot, came to Siñhala's father in all her bewitching beauty, and complained that she had been forsaken by Siñhala who had married her. But Siñhala was successful in making his father understand what she really was. The female ogre then proceeded to the king of the country to proffer a complaint against Siñhala. The king was convinced by her that her story was true, and, on Siñhala's refusal to take her back, accepted her as his own queen. In a short time, however, he with all his family was devoured by her. Siñhala was, by the unanimous consent of the citizens, raised to the throne. He expelled the Rākshasis from Tāmradvīpa, and named it Siñhala after himself.

“I am, O Vishkambhī, that Siñhala ; Avalokiteśvara is the horse Balāha, Mahallaka the Bodhisattva is the king, and Anupañṣā is that Rākshasī. The merits of Avalokiteśvara may be counted by myriads. In one of the pores of his body there are thousands of heavenly choristers, in another millions of Rishis.”

Vishkambhī then heard from the Lord the benefits of repeating the formula of six letters or Shaḍaksharī Mantra, and obtained that mantra at Benares.

The work was translated into Chinese, according to the Rev. S. Beal's Tripiṭhaka, (p. 35) under the name of Mau-chu-pa'o-ts'ang-to-lo-ni-king, its Sanskrit equivalent being Ratna-karandaka-vyūha-sūtra. It is reckoned among the Mahāyāna Sūtras.

A story in illustration of Beneficence. Lord Buddha held a large assembly of his followers. Śaripatra requested the Lord to pronounce an eulogium on charity. The Lord gave them the following story, said to have been first told by Vipasyī long before the lord's advent.

Once on a time Tatavisuta was born a monkey, Jñānākara by name. In consequence of his sinful character the whole forest was beset with darkness at the time of his birth, and famine raged on all sides. Some time after Dipankara's presence in the forest restored it to light, and there was plenty of everything. Jñānākara, wondering at this sudden change, gave a jack fruit to the worker of the miracle. Dipankara gave him instruction in the philosophy of Buddhism, and promised him transformation into man. He learned the character of man from a friend, and, dying, was born a merchant's son at Kāmarthī. He was named Dharmaśrī. When Dharmaśrī was very young, Dipankara, who was passing by asked him to give the applicant anything that he could afford with good will. Dharmaśrī gave a handful of dust, which was instantly changed into gold. He gave another handful of dust which was changed into dainties for the Sangha. Dipankara granted him a boon, saying, "for this good conduct, you are to become Sarvananda, the king of Dipāvati. Sarvananda always used to please Dipankara with food, and raiment."

Then the Lord gave the assembled multitude a lecture on morals, diversifying with a description of the Satya Yuga and the duties which appertained to that Yuga.

A highly amplified version of the work noticed under the name of Guṇakāraṇḍavyūha. The work is in prose, but it has obviously been amplified from the poetical version abovenamed. The names and incidents have been in some cases modified or changed, and many new incidents and stories have been worked in. But the purport remains the same—the glorification of the great Bodhisattva Ārya

Avalokiteśvara. The differences are not of such a character as to need detailed specification. The work belongs to the class Mahāyāna Sūtra, and, as usual in that class of writings, does not bear the name of its author. Its name does not occur in the Rev. S. Beal's Tripīṭhaka.

KAVIKUMĀRA KATHĀ.

कविकुमारकथा ।

Substance, yellow paper, 10×4. Folia, 18. Lines on a page, 8. Character, Newāri. Appearance, old. Prose and verse. Incorrect.

A story of one of Buddha's former existences. It was related by Upa Gupta to Aśoka as a narrative which had been originally told by Buddha himself to his followers at Gridhrakūṭa to account for an incurable sore on his toe. The occasion for the recital was offered by a Śākya youth having at early dawn pelted a large stone at Buddha to kill him, and the stone falling on his toe caused a deep wound. The followers enquired why such an accident had happened, and Buddha in reply gave the story. Formerly there lived in the city of Kāmpilya a king named Satyarata. His chief queen Lakshmaṇā was for a time childless, but on the king's taking a second wife named Sudharmā, the former bore a son, who was named Lolamantra. On the death of the King, Lolamantra succeeded to the kingdom, but soon after Sudharmā bore a posthumous child who, at the time of birth, had a jewelled coronet on his head. The boy was named Kavikumāra. When the news of his birth was brought to the king, astrologers informed him that the boy would for certain set him aside. The king thereupon deputed a person to kill the child, but the news of this had already been communicated to Sudharmā by Govishāna, a favourite of the king and so she deposited her child with a fisherman (Kaivarta), and, taking his new-born daughter sent her to the king as the child she had bourn. A few years after, the king's astrologer, seeing the boy playing at king in a field, knew that was the son of Sudharmā, and informed the king of the imposition that had been practiced on him. The king was greatly incensed, and deputed a large army to kill the boy; but the boy had timely information, and, taking the jewelled coronet from his mother, ran away, and, hiding first in the house of a potter, then in that of a hatter, then in a forest, at last fell into a river. The king's messenger thinking that would put an end to the life of the boy, came back, and reported the circumstances to the king. The boy, however, was saved from death by a Yaksha. From the Yaksha he repaired to a forest where he was attacked by a hunter, but a Vidyādhara interposed, and cut off the head of the assailant, and taught the youth the science of magic. By the power of this magic the youth assumed the form of a beautiful damsel, and returned to the dominion of his brother. The king Lolamantra was enchanted by the beauty and the musical accomplishments of the damsel, and invited her to his bed-chamber, but, when he attempted to embrace her, Kavikumāra assumed his masculine form, and killed him. Buddha said, "I am that Kavikumāra, and because I had killed my brother, I was doomed to hell for many thousand years, and now a small remnant of my sin has given me this sore."

The work professes to form a part of a large work named Vratāva-dāna-mālā."

A collection of rituals. By Kuladatta. In its general character the work bears a close relation to the Hindu Tāntrīc digests. The codex begins with the definitions of a spiritual guide and his disciple. Then comes the ceremony for erecting and consecrating a Vihāra. One desirous of erecting a Vihāra should proceed to his spiritual guide on an auspicious day and under an auspicious asterism, and, after paying something in the shape of Dakṣiṇā, thrice ask his permission to erect a Vihāra. The request should be made in the following terms : "I am, Sir, an Upāsaka. I am desirous of building a Vihāra ; I solicit your permission." From the time of serving this notice, the spiritual guide should employ himself in such ceremonies as are required previous to the erection, particularly relating to those for producing materials and for removing obstructions, and he should count his beads one hundred thousand times, repeating the mystic formula of Chakreśa, or of the divinity he usually worships. When the number of repetitions is complete, he should proceed to the examination of a site for the building. A piece of land covered by inauspicious trees is unsuitable for a Vihāra. Land with pippala trees on the east, pentaptera Arjuna on the south-east, Butea frondosa on the south, fig trees on the south-west, silk-cotton trees on the west, Vakula (Mimosops elengi) on the north-west, glomorous fig trees on the north, and thortny trees on the north-east, is pronounced inauspicious. A triangular piece of ground, or one with uneven surface and full of pits is to be avoided. Land situated on the south-east, the south, the south-west, the west, and the north-west sides of a town or corner is unsuitable. Soil mixed with broken pots, grease, oil or milk, and sacrificial grounds, and cremation ghauts, are impure. But hills, and places where there are Chaityas, Āśramas, penance groves and temples are pure. Vihāras should be erected on these. A square plot of ground stretching towards the east, or the north, is the most auspicious. The site for a Vihāra should have tanks full of white, red or blue lotuses on the north ; mango, jāma and kadamba groves interspersed with large flowering trees on the east ; punnāge, pārijāta, and other trees with sweet-scented flowers, and with the underground covered with jasmines &c. on the south ; and shady trees like pippala, jack &c. and juicy plants, on the west. The sound of Biṇa, flute, tom-tom &c. are auspicious. For Brāhmaṇas earth of a white colour, and having the smell of curdled milk, ghi &c. and a sweet taste is auspicious ; for Kshatriyas, that of a red colour, having the scent of lotus, champaka &c., and astringent taste ; for Vaiśyas, that of yellow colour, and having the flavour of wine and of the exudation from the temples of elephants, and sour taste ; for Śūdras, that of a black colour, no smell and bitter and pungent taste is preferable.

There are several different modes for finding out what land is suitable for what caste, and also what land is suitable for a Vihāra. Dig a pit one or two cubits square, place white flowers on the east, red on the west, yellow on the north, and blue on the south sides of the pit. The colour of the flower that withers the latest will indicate the caste for which the land is fitted for a Vihāra. Again, pour a quantity of water into the selfsame pit, light a lamp on an earthen pot. If it produces a white flame on the east, it is fit for Brāhmaṇas, if a red flame on the west, it is for the warrior caste, and so forth. There are other modes for finding the same thing out. Some say the city in which a Vihāra is to be erected should be situated on the northern, some say on the southern bank of a river.

When the Vihāra is to be consecrated by sacrifice, the Āchārya, thoroughly versed in the three samādhis, should sit in the evening on a square diagram well cleansed with cow-dung ; he should first worship the three jewels and praise the ten Dikpālas by chanting gāthās, and then, with the left knee touching the ground, and the hands folded, ask them for land by uttering certain gāthās.

Then turning towards the south and placing before him an earthen pot shaped like a crescent, he should scatter over it charcoal dust from a cremation ground, and also blue flowers. The next ceremony is that of lighting the Kopāgni—a fire taken from the hearth of the Chāṇḍāla who guards the cremation ground. In this fire, burning with full blaze, the Āchārya should pour forth libations with the sound of hum bursting from his throat and with the chant of the awful formula “Nīla-varṇam Nīlāmbharaṇa bhūshitam” &c. Then he should employ himself in removing ‘salyas’ or such evil working bones as may be underground. Then follow the ceremonies of Vāstu worship, worship of Vihāradevatā, measurement of the ground with a string, observation of omens, examination of the Vāstu serpent, laying of the foundation stone, division of the Vihāra into rooms, felling of trees for the Vihāra, different measures of these trees according to the difference of caste, &c.

The work then lays down rules for building a dwelling-house. The table of measurement is as follows :

7 atoms	make		1	aṇḍa (egg).
7 aṇḍas	"		1	sukshmaraja or minute powder.
7 sukshmarajas	"		1	śaśaraja.
7 śaśarajas	"		1	ekāḍharaja
7 ekāḍharajas	"		1	sāraja.
7 sārajas	"		1	yūka.
7 yūkas	"		1	yava or barley.
6 yavas	"		1	kaniyaśanguli.
7 yavas	"		1	madhyamānguli.
8 yavas	"		4	jyeshṭhānguli.
11 angulis	"		1	vitastī.
1 vitastī	"		1	cubit.

The room of a Vihāra in which the Lord's image is to be placed should be painted with the representations of Tathāgatas, Bodhisattvas, the goddess of knowledge and Vidyādhara. A pair of eyes and a pair of water-pots are to be painted on every door, on the outer face of the door the ten figures of a water-pot, an ear &c. ; at the top of the windows, Tathāgatas, chosen Bodhisattvas, and various decorations. In the interior of the room, just against the image, should the Bodhi tree be painted, with Varuṇa and Lokādhīpas on the right and left of the image. Varuṇa should be painted white, with two hands, holding a terrible noose. On the right side of the door, should be painted the two fierce images of Mahābala, and Mahākāla,—Mahābala black with two hands, one face, and three eyes at once red and circular, his hairs brown and raised upwards, his face fierce with protuberant teeth, with tiger skin for clothes and eight serpents for ornaments, touching the right shoulders with the four fingers of the left, and the left shoulder with those of the right hand.

The figure of Mahākāla is nearly the same but made fiercer by a garland of skulls.

On the left side of the door should be painted the king and the queen of Hareta birds facing each other, the queen seated on an emerald throne, white, exceedingly beautiful, with jeweller staff in hand, and ever engaged in one of her five hundred frolics. The king should be represented as sitting on a throne of rubies. The painted figures are to be consecrated by ceremonies peculiar to each.

The work then enters upon the subject of ordination. A disciple desirous of renouncing the world should take a solemn vow, with folded hands, before his spiritual guide, in the following words :

“I such and such a person, take shelter with Dharma, take shelter with Buddha, take shelter with the Sangha for ever.” The spiritual guide should then communicate to him the five Śikshāpadas or Primary Lessons. The disciple should promise to take nothing not given to him, to renounce double-dealing, falsehood, and the use of wine, during the course of his whole life, and solicit his spiritual guide to grant him the light of the Five Lessons in the following words :—“Grant me, O Lord, the protection of the three, grant all that an upāsaka wants, such as the Five Lessons &c. ; my name is such and such, I solicit the favour of my Āchārya in investing me as a Bhikshu.” After this, his head should be shaved, leaving only the coronal hair. Then the Guru should try the firmness of his disciple’s determination by questions, and, having satisfied himself of his sincerity, should anoint him with waters brought from the four oceans, and make him put on a piece of ochre-colored cloth. The Neophyte should announce his entrance into the order by repeating the following word three times : “I, of such and such a name, throw away the signs of a householder’s state for ever, and receive those of a hermit.” Then he should place himself entirely under the protection of the ‘three jewels’ by reciting the formula—“I take refuge with Dharma, I take refuge with Buddha. I take refuge with Sangha.” After having received the ten commandments from the Guru, he should have recourse to the following formula—“As my Lord never neglects the duties of life, so I too promise never to deviate from the path of duty in my life.” Then he should request his guru to favour him with an alms-bowl and a piece of ochre-colored cloth. He should call the whole congregation around him, place his right knee on the ground, and with folded hands, say, “I am named such and such bring that piece of cloth to me, let it remain here that the congregation may have confidence in me, and delight to see me. Bring that piece of cloth, Upādhyāya. I request you, let it remain here for the satisfaction of the congregation. Bring that piece of cloth, O Lord, that I may inspire confidence.” On the Āchārya’s handing him over the consecrated cloth, he should wear it, and thenceforth be one of the Bhikshus.

The text is full of technical terms, and not always intelligible.

An account of a fast called Poshadhavrata, illustrated by a tale regarding the origin of the Ikshvāku race, and the miraculous transformation of one of the descendants of Ikshāku. This descendant, named Kuśa, was no other than Buddha himself in a former life. The work professes to be a part of a large collection of tales, which bears the title of 'Mahavasvāvadāna-Kathā.' The story in questions is said to have been first related to Rājā Aśoka by Upa Gupta who had heard it from Buddha himself. The occasion for it was given by the story of Bodhisattva's destroying the wicked Māra by the sound of a hiccough. The Bhikshus all expressed their wonder at the tale of so great a miracle, and Śākya Muni related to them a story of which the following is an abstract :

Subandhu of Benares was the lord of sixty thousand cities. In the bed-chamber of the royal palace, there sprang up, all of a sudden a large number of sugarcane trees. From one of these a boy was produced, who was named Ikshvāku after his birth-place. On the demise of Subandhu, Ikshvāku ascended the throne. He had five hundred wives of whom Avūdā was the chief. Avūdā obtained from Indra a pill which promoted pregnancy. This she dissolved in water, and took a small quantity of the mixture, distributing the rest of it to her rivals. Every one of them gave birth to a son of whom Avūdā's child was the most ugly ; but it had on its person all the signs of a royal personage. All the children had the cognomen of Kuśa, such as, Indrakuśa, Devakuśa &c., after the kuśa grass at the extremity of which their mothers had partaken of the medicinal water. Kuśa, the son of Avūdā, was, as the eldest and born of the chief queen, raised to the throne, and he married Sudarśanā, the daughter of the king of Kānyakubja in Sūrasena. Sudarśanā finding her husband very ugly, left his house, and went over to her father's. Kuśa too proceeded to Kānyakubja, and there displayed his skill in various arts to win the heart of his consort. By the advice of his father-in-law, he placed a valuable jewel (Jyotirasa) on his head. Instantly his ugliness was changed into the most charming beauty, and his wife had no more objection in accepting him.

An account of a visit paid by Śākya to the king of Lankā (Ceylon), and of his preachings in that island. It is reckoned as one of the nine principal texts of Nepalese Buddhism, and held in high esteem. In common with the other eight works, it is called a "Muhāvaipulya Mahāyāna Sūtra." Three different translations of it exist in the Chinese, one under the name of Tarshing-jih-ling-kia-king, another under Lang-kia-o-po-ta-lo-pao-king, and the third under Jih-leng-kia-king, the last by Bodhiruchi of the Wei Dynasty (circa 168-190.)

Abstract. Buddha had been on a visit to the capital of the serpents. (Nāgaloka) in the ocean, but returned thence in a week, and settled on the mount Malaya in Lankā. Rāvaṇa came to pay his respects to the great personage, and prayed him to give the definitions of virtue and vice. When Rāvaṇa was satisfied, a Bodhisattva, Mahāmāti by name, asked Buddha several questions, and received satisfactory answers. The questions were 1st, From what principle of human nature ratiocination has its origin ? 2nd, How an argument can be made pure, i.e., how to detect fallacies ? What is the nature of fallacies ? From what principle in human nature do fallacies proceed ? Where do the emancipated go ? How could one in bondage be emancipated ? What object do holy men meditate upon ? What effect is produced by belief ? What is a cause ? What an effect ? What are the hundred and eight padas or select sentences ? What are the different ways in which Vijñānas or ideas are generated ? In how many ways are they retained, and how are they lost ? What are the grounds of a belief in the fact of universal causation ? What is ambiguity in speech ? How and from what source is it produced ? What is Nirvāṇa ? How do Arhats and Tathāgatas hold the meditation of Bodhisattvas ? What are the different definitions of obtaining attention and of moving it ? What are fixed as the five in succession ? What are the definitions of entity and non-entity ? What are the definitions of teaching, doctrine, and regulation or rule ? What are the eight different sorts of transitoriness ? What are Bodhisattvas, Śrāvakas, Pratyeka Buddhas, Nirodhakramas and Amesandhis ? Whether Tathāgata is eternal ? When all these questions were answered, the Lord delivered a lecture on the Saugata philosophy, and explained the nature of a mystic formula which wards Rākshasas off.

A cyclopaedia of Buddhist legends and doctrines. It gives an elaborate history of Buddha's life and preachings, explaining every incident of his life by references to his past existences. It also gives a simple and popular exposition of many abstruse doctrines of the Buddhist faith.

When Lord Buddha was at the Jetavana grove, Maudgalāyana visited eight principal places of torture in hell. They were—(1) Saṅjīva, (2) Kālasūtra, (3) Saughāta, (4) 1st Raurava, (5) 2nd Raurava, Mahāvīchi, (7) Tapana, (8) Pratapana. On his return from the infernal regions, he delivered four different speeches before four different assemblies, painting in glowing colours, the tortures, the convulsions, the insufferable pain of the nether world. After the conclusion of each lecture, he enjoined, in forcible language, the necessity of Brāhmaçarya and of abstinence.¹

When the Lord lived at Gr̥idhrakuṭa in Rājagṛīha, Maudgalāyana chanced to meet a Suddhāvāsa Devaputra. From him he learned of the great merits of one Uttiya, a banker, the disciple of Sarvāvibhū. Maudgalāyana immediately changed his destination, and directed his steps towards Vasumati, where Uttiya lived. On his way he happened to meet Abhaya and Nanda, two Bhikshus. He cultivated Abhaya's friendship, but tried to annoy Nanda by calling him a Brahmachāri, but in vain. They all proceeded to Sarvāvibhū before whom Maudgalāyana made a confession of his wicked design of annoying Nanda. He feasted the Lord with rich viands obtained from Uttiya and some perfumers. The Lord said to Abhaya, who had betaken himself to meditation, "You are to become a Buddha in future, in the hundred thousandth Kalpa—your name will be Sākya Muni, and these perfumers with Maudgalāyana will be your first Śrāvakas." Lord Sarvāvibhū then taught them the four Charyās or practices. The first refers to the conduct of those who love their parents, live in their families, revere Brāhmaṇas, beg in their own quarters, never neglect the ten duties, instruct others, relieve the poor, perform good works, worship the lord, and train the mind for the reception of the highest Sambodhi knowledge : this Charyā is called Prakṛitī. 2nd, The conduct of those who hope for Buddhahood in one of the innumerable Kalpas to come, who want to be perfect in knowledge and in good conduct, to be the lord and governor of gods and men ; it is called Praṇidhāna Charyā. 3rd, Those who hope for Bodhi knowledge by gradation, are said to be in Anuloma Charyā. 4th, The endeavours of men to put a period to future transmigration are included in the last or Vivarttana Charyā.

At the request of Maudgalāyana, Kāśyapa gave him a description of the ten Bhūmis or stages, they are : (1) Durārohā, (2) Varddhamānā, (3) Pushpamaṇḍitā, (4) Ruchirā, (5) Chittavichitrā, (6) Rūpavatī, (7) Durjayā, (8) Janmānudeśa, (9) Jauvarā, (10) Abhishekā. A Bhūmi means the ground-work of Bodhisattva knowledge. The names, however, here given do not correspond with what occur in the Daśa-bhūmiśvara, ante, p. 87. The characteristics of the first Bhūmi are alms-giving, mercy, indefatigableness, want of arrogance, knowledge of the Śāstras, progress, the power of pleasing men, and patience.

The characteristics of the 2nd stage are twenty Adhyāśayas or intentions. They are, (1) intention for doing good, called Kalyāṇādhyāśaya ; (2) Snigdhadhyāśaya, or that state of mind, in which the man is never moved by anger ; (3) Madhurādhyāśaya, or that state of the mind in which people are disposed to please women by service ; (4) Tikshnādhyaśaya, or the knowledge of this world and the world to come ; (5) Vipulādhyaśaya, or the desire resulting in the active exertion for doing good to all creatures ; (6) Vichitrādhyaśaya, or charity without pride ; (7) Aparyyādānādhyaśaya, open-handedness ; (8) Anupahatādhyaśaya, or the power of resisting the temptations of the wicked ; (9) Aśadhāraṇādhyaśaya, or uncommon diligence for the happiness of the whole animal creation ; (10) Unnatādhyaśaya, or contempt for the doctrines of Tirthikas ; (11) Ahripanādhyaśaya, or pursuit of virtue for other than enjoyment ; (12) Anivartyādhyaśaya, or firmness in the belief in Buddha in spite of strong temptations ; (13) Akritrimādhyaśaya, or aversion to the state of merchants, Pratyeka Buddhas, and others ; (14) Śuddhāśaya, or desire for supreme good and contempt for all gains ; (15) Driḍhādhyaśaya, or determination in spite of opposition ; (16) Svabhāvādhyaśaya, or contempt for gifts not given with a good will ; (17) Triptādhyaśaya, contentment or aversion to earthly enjoyment ; (18) Puṅgalādhyaśaya, ambition for omniscience ; (19) Anantādhyaśaya, or charity without the expectation of celestial enjoyments in return. The 20th is not given.

The principal characteristic of the third stage is the passion for alms-giving. The following is a list of the duties to be performed in gradually passing from the fourth to the eighth stage. Reverence to parents ; firm belief in the identity of the Stūpa with the Sangha or Buddhist congregation ; aversion to all hostile criticism against Tathāgata's character ; aversion to sin ; accumulation of meritorious deeds ; exertion for virtue ; aversion to slaughter ; dislike of grievous hurts in a burst of passion ; close adherence to the ten ways to virtue ; unwillingness to mix in counsels for murder ; performance of good work without vulgar curiosity ; cheerfulness in times of danger ; absence of a sense of exaltation in times of prosperity ; purity of heart ; holiness of desires, and pious works. In the eighth stage of the mind becomes all-mercy. The Bodhisattvas, who passing the ninth enter the tenth stage, become the means of doing an immense amount of good to others. On receiving the full development of the tenth stage the Bodhisattva, who pants for human abode and longs to receive an earthly form, is a Sambuddha. He enters the womb, remains in the womb, obtains his caste, renounces the world ; heroism and knowledge become his characteristic virtues.

The last is explained by references to the history of Śākya Muni. He entered Māyā's womb, that is, his Garbhākṛānti. His son remained for years in Yaśodharā's womb. He renounced the world and so forth. The Sannibaddha, who dwells at the root of the Bodhi tree and obtains omniscience, gets five eyes, viz., the animal eye, the celestial eye, the eye of knowledge, that of religion, and that of Buddha. The animal eye sees by the help of light. It sees real objects and minute objects. The celestial eye is superior to the eyes of Devas and Yakshas—larger, brighter and more powerful. The eye of Dharma produces ten different powers ; 1st the power of appreciating ; 2nd, that of appreciating the merits of men of different kinds ; 3rd, that of knowing the different essences which lead to mukti ; 4th, that of knowing the characters of other people ; 5th, that of knowing the consequences of good or bad actions ; 6th, that of evading mundane pains ; 7th, the knowledge of the importance of meditation ; 8th, the power of recalling to mind the events of former existences ; 9th, the purity of the celestial eye ; 10th, the destruction of all mundane pains.

The Buddha's eye sees eighteen things ; It gives unrestricted view of the present ; (2) the remembrance of the past ; (3) prescience of the future ; (4) perfect knowledge following delusions i.e., false knowledge, false work &c. ; (5) of all previous perfect knowledge following the delusions of mind, karma &c. ; (6) of all perfect knowledge consequent on delusions produced by words ; (7) the belief that ideas or opinions cannot be destroyed ; (8) strength ; (9) memory ; (10) deep meditation ; (11) perfect knowledge ; (12) the knowledge that emanicipation can be injured ; (13) there is no falling off ; (14) no creation ; (15) permanence of devotion to memory ; (16) permanence of the faculties of the mind ; (17) fearlessness ; (18) unity of determination.

Lord Buddha delivered a long discourse on the greatness of the Jinas, and on their duties and excellences. They give instruction to the congregation ; and though possessing superhuman powers and abilities, still conform to the ways of man. They wash their faces, though these smell sweetly. They take baths, though ever so pure. They take meal, though they never feel hungry. The voice of a Sugata sounds like music, and is as delightful as the distant rolling of clouds.

Dīpaṅkara.—Kāśyapa gave the following account of Dīpaṅkara to Maudgalāyana. In one of the innumerable past kalpas there was a king named Archchishṭa in the royal city of Dīpavatī. Dīpavatī was a large city, extending over an area of 84 square Yojanas. Bodhisattva Dīpaṅkara, while descending from the Tushita heaven, thought Archchishṭa to be a suitable father for him, and accordingly entered the womb of his queen, the virtuous Susīla. This was done on the occasion when the full-moon was in conjunction with the auspicious asterism Pushyā. The mother was in a state of sound health, neither affected by bilious nor by phlegmatic humour. She saw the Bodhisattva in her womb, and the Bodhisattva saw her from it. When in the throes of childbirth, she requested the king to send her to a tank where lotus grows. When she arrived at the side of the tank, lo ! an island sprang up in the midst of it. The Bodhisattva was born on that island. At the moment of his birth there was a miraculous manifestation of a large number of bright lamps, hence his name Dīpañkara. On the second day of his birth Dīpañkara commenced his philanthropic tour round the earth, equally useful to gods and men. For the benefits of his relations he returned to Dīpavatī with eighty thousand Bhikshus in his company. The king, his father, accorded him a magnificent reception. He employed five hundred Brāhman̄s to recite Vedic hymns. Megha, one of these, offered five lotus flowers to Dīpañkara, and asked a boon to the effect that he might become in one of his future existences equal to Dīpañkara in power, in knowledge, and in every good quality. His request was granted. It was foretold on the occasion that Megha would become Buddha Śākya Muni of Kapilavastu.

Maṅgala Vastu.—The Lord said to Maudgalāyana that he obtained a similar boon from Mangala the next Buddha after Dīpañkara. Maṅgala had three several congregations consisting of a hundred thousand, ninety thousand and eighty thousand Śrāvakas respectively. His two favourite disciples were Sudeva and Dharmadeva and two principal Bhikshunis, Sībā and Rochanā. Sudeva and Śivā were celebrated for their knowledge, and the other two for their power of working miracles (riddhi). Maṅgala's father was Sundara, and his mother Śrī. The future Śākya Muni was then an elephant, Atula by name, a resident of the city of Uttara. He gave Maṅgala a hearty welcome and got his benediction.

Chhattra Vastu.—In the Sub-Himalayan regions there lived a female Yaksha, named Kaṇḍalā, who had one thousand sons, some being twins. They proceeded to Vaiśālī and stole the vital power of the inhabitants. Labouring under various diseases, people forgot to propagate their species. The Lichchhavas, the royal Kshatriyas of Vaiśālī, were then the most influential men. To remedy this evil Tomala, their headman, undertook a journey to Rājagṛiha where Lord Buddha had been dwelling for some time.

On the solicitation of Tomala, Buddha consented to grace the city with his presence. Vimbiśara the king of Rājagṛiha begged permission to follow him, and it was easily granted. The Lichchhavas came a long way to receive the Lord.

When they reached the banks of the Ganges, a parrot, a messenger from Gosṛṅga came, humbly bowed to the Lord, invited him in human voice to Gosṛṅga, and went away. Every one wondered at the human voice of the bird ; but the Lord said, that was nothing new ; Brahmadata king of Benares had three sons, the first an owl, the second a starling, the third a parrot. Up to an advanced age he had no sons. He went to the Himālayas to receive the blessings of the Rishis. They advised him to pick up three eggs which he had seen on the way, and to nurse the young ones as his sons. He placed those eggs in vessels filled with honey and clarified butter. The eggs produced young ones in due time. The young chicks were equally intelligent, each had a strong retentive memory, and each spoke just as men do. They were all trained in state-craft. When asked by the king, they gave very intelligent answers with regard to the first principles in politics. The owl said, "Strong passions are unworthy of a king, for when he restrains his passions, his wealth increases, his virtues and his intelligence have free scope for development." The starling (śālika) said, "There are three cardinal points in political economy, acquisition of wealth, accumulation of wealth, and proper investment of the accumulated hoards." The parrot said, "There are five sources of a king's strength. 1st power, (2) children, (3) relatives, (4) army consisting of elephants, horse, foot and chariots, (5) prudence, the most important of all."

As soon as the Lord touched the boundary of the city all the inhabitants regained their health. Every one was astonished at this miracle. The Lord said, "Do not wonder, this is not the first time that epidemic diseases have been cured by my presence. In one of my former existences, I was Rakshita, the son of Brahmadata's priest ; this Brahmadata was the king of Kampillya in Pāṇchāla. Rakshita, deeply sensible of the miseries of the worldly life, betook himself to the forest at the foot of the Himālayas, and there practised austerities. In a short time he acquired considerable power of working miracles. He could touch the sun and the moon with his hands. At this time the people of Kampillya contracted a contagious disease which defied the skill of experienced physicians. But as soon as Rakshita entered the outskirts of the city at the request of the king, all the sufferers were reported to be convalescent.

"Similarly, when I had been born as Maheśa, the renowned elephant of the king of Benares, I was invited by the people of Mithilā to cure them of an epidemic (Amānusha-vyādhi) : my presence was enough for the attainment of their end.

“In the same manner. I saved the citizens of Rājagṛīha by my presence, when I had been Rishava, a bull, in the kingdom of Anga.”

Thus saying, and taking a meal, the Lord directed his steps towards the lake Markaṭa.

Story of Mālinī.—A Pratyeka Buddha entered the city of Vārāṇasī for alms, but got nothing. A girl, finding his alms-bowl empty, brought him home, and gave him a hearty meal. When he died a stūpa was erected on his remains, and the girl decorated the stūpa every day with flowers and aromatics. She desired that she may be born with a garland of flowers in every one of her future existence ; her desire was fulfilled. In her next existence she was born a Devakanyā with a garland of flowers round her neck. From heaven she descended on earth, and was born in the same way as Mālinī, the daughter of Kriki, king of Vārāṇasī. Mālinī invited lord Kāśyapa and his retinue, and entertained them with a sumptuous meal. The Brāhmins, numerous and influential at the court of her father, taking umbrage at her conduct, induced the king to order her banishment. Mālinī humbly begged a week's respite, which was granted. During those seven days, five hundred of her brothers, the ministers and officers of the Bhaṭṭa army, and the citizens were all converted to the Ārya Dharma. The converts regarded Mālinī as the saviour of their souls. Angry at the wicked machinations of the Brāhmins, they proceeded in a body to remonstrate with them. The Brāhmins took refuge with the king. They revoked the sentence of Mālinī's banishment ; but induced the king to send ten armed men to kill Kāśyapa, the root of all their woes. These armed men were easily converted by the great Sage. They next deputed a larger number of men, but with the same result. They saw that by sending armed men they only added to the already overwhelming number of perverts. They, therefore, determined to despatch the business themselves. Armed with clubs, maces and other weapons they marched in martial array to the hermitage of Kāśyapa. Kāśyapa invoked the goddess Prithvi, and desired her to show her powers against these Brāhmins. She rooted up a stout palm tree, hurled it at the Brāhmins, and crushed them to death.

Story of Jyotipāla.—Mārakāraṇḍa was a place in the kingdom of Kośāla. Buddha dwelt there for some time with all his congregation. One day, just on the breaking up of his meditation, his eyes fell on a piece of grassy plain of wide extent. He smiled. Ānanda, who stood near, asked "O Lord, why do you smile?" The Lord said, "This plain had been the dwelling place of Kāśyapa. He had his hut here. Kṛakachchhanda, Kaṇaka and Kāśyapa all sat at this spot." He added, "This Mārakāraṇḍa had been at one time Veruḍiṅga, a village principally inhabited by Brāhmaṇa. Kāśyapa had here only one disciple, named Ghaṭikāra, a maker of earthenwares. Jyotipāla was one of the young sons of Ghaṭikāra. The disciple heard one day that his Lord was dwelling in a forest close to Veruḍiṅga. With great difficulty he dragged his unwilling son, fond of idle play, to the presence of the sage, who gave the youth "the five lessons." In a short time Jyotipāla entered a hermitage. When Kāśyapa, in the course of his perambulations, returned to Ghaṭikāra from Vārāṇasi, for to him Ghaṭikāra was dearer than the king of that place. Jyotipāla asked him for a boon, praying to be raised to the list of Buddhas in a future existence. This boon was granted, and it was also foretold that Jyotipāla would practise Brahmacharya in the Bhadrakalpa at Kapila vastu, and, then rising to the Tushita heaven, should become a Devaputra named Svetaketu, and afterwards Śākya Siṅha.

Origin of the Kauliya tribe.—Kalyāṇa was the son of the king Mahā-sammata. Kalyāṇa begat Rāva, Rāva begat Uposhadha. Uposhadha begat Māndhātā. The descendants of Māndhātā were all kings for several generations. One of them, Sujāta, became king of the Ikshāku in the great city of Sāketa. He had six children. The five legitimate children were, Upura, Nipura, Kalakaṇḍaka, Ulkāmukha, and Hastikaśīrsha. The illegitimate son was Jeta, the son of a concubine named Jetī. The king was so very fond of her that, in compliance while her wishes, he disinherited his legitimate sons, and nominated Jeta to the throne. The disinherited sons preceded towards the north, followed by a large retinue of loyal citizens and soldiers. They were at first hospitably entertained by the king of Kośala. But their popularity with his own subjects displeased the king. He dismissed them from his presence, and ordered them to quit his city. They entered a forest at the foot of the Himālaya, where Rishi Kapila had his dwelling-place. They built a city there, the city was named Kapilavastu from the vicinity of the Rishi. Upara, the eldest of the brothers, was elected king. He was succeeded by Nipura. Karakaṇḍa succeeded Nipura, and was himself succeeded by Ulkāmukha. Ulkāmukha had Hastikaśīrsha for his son, and Siṅhatanu for his grandson. Siṅhatanu had four sons and one daughter. The sons were Śuddhodana, Dhautodana, Śuklodana, Amṛitodana, and the daughter was Amitā. Amitā was a leper. All the skill of the royal physician was employed in vain to cure her. The loathsome disease made her an object of general hatred. Her brothers carried her to a hill named Utsaṅga-parvata, where they placed her in a subterranean room stored with provisions which would last for years. The entrance to the room was closed for ever. The only door by which the interior could be approached was covered with planks; and a heap of earth, placed on those planks, concealed everything. The new mode of living had its effects on Amitā's constitution. She, in a short time, recovered from the dreadful disease. A tiger caught the scent of a human being, and scratching the earth away laid the planks bare. Kola, a Rishi, who lived close by, happened to come near the planks. He removed them, and discovered Amitā blooming with all the freshness of youth. The charming maid made an impression on his mind. He married her. The marriage was blessed with an issue of 32 children. These were sent to Kapilavastu, where they were received with open arms, because Kola was no unworthy relation to the Śākya, having himself reigned for a long time as the king of Vārāṇasī. Amitā's sons were known either by their patronymic Kauliya, or by the name of Vyāghrapādyā, from the circumstance of their mother having been discovered by a tiger. The Śākya and Kauliyas were afterwards connected by innumerable matrimonial ties.

Birth and Marriage of Māyā Devī.—There was in the country of Devaūha a great Śākya named Subhūti. He married in the family of the Kauliyas, and had seven daughters, viz., (1) Māyā; (2) Mahāmāyā; (3) Atimāyā; (4) Anantamāyā; (5) Chūlimāyā; (6) Kolisābā and (7) Mahāprajāvatī. Māyā was the most lovely, the most beautiful and the most accomplished of them all. When Siṅhahanu died, and was succeeded by his son Śuddhodana, the first measure of the new king was the celebration of his own marriage with Māyā and Mahāprajāvatī, and that of his brother with the other daughters of Subhūti. All the Pratyeka Buddhas were delighted in giving their respective forecasts (Vyākaraṇāni) to the effect that the Bodhisatva would descend from the Tushita heaven in the twelfth year after this marriage.

Story of the Deer Kings.—There were five hundred Pratyeka Buddhas at Rishipattana in Vārāṇasī. They too gave their own Vyākaraṇānis. At that time there were two lords of the deer at Vārāṇasī; they were named Nyagrodha and Viśākha, sons of Rāhaka. Each of them had a flock of 500 deer under him. Brahmadaṭṭa, king of Vārāṇasī, was in the habit of hunting and killing the deer. The deer kings, unable to stop this slaughter of their subjects, made a treaty with the king on the condition of sending one deer every day to the royal kitchen. Years rolled on. No party had any reason for complaint. The king, secure in the enjoyment of the tribute of venison, discontinued his hunting excursions. The deer, too, after having spared one of themselves for the king every day, jumped, frisked and ran about just as they liked. At last an event occurred which put a stop to the tribute altogether. It was on the occasion when a doe was in her turn to be sent to the king. She was enciente. She applied to the deer-king Viśākha under whom she lived, for a change of her turn on the score of her being big with two fawns. Her death, so pleaded she, would cause the death of three animals. But none of the flock volunteered to go in her stead. When the deer kings found their efforts to be of no avail, Nyagrodha, one of them, nobly resolved to sacrifice himself at the altar of charity. He preceeded forthwith to the royal presence, and explained to him the circumstances under which he had taken the resolution. The king was struck with wonder at the generosity of the poor animal, and immediately issued a proclamation freeing the deer-kings from their contract.

Exactly at the time of this proclamation Bodhisattva was descending from the Tushita heaven. He was thinking of a family which he could grace with his birth. Vimbiśāra and Udayana requested the Lord to honor Rājagriha or Kauśāmbī by making at his birth-place. But he preferred Suddhodana, because Māyā, his would-be mother, was virtuous, kind-hearted, and honorable, and she had only seven days to live after the birth of her son.

Birth of Buddha.—Actuated by a divine impulse Māyā requested her husband to send her alone to the Dhritarāshṭra palace. There she intended to practise the eleven virtues of Ahimśā, Brahmacharyya &c. Suddhodana complied with her request. On the night of the full moon, when the moon was in the Pushyā constellation, the Bodhisattva entered the left side of his mother while she was reclining after sunset on a milk-white sofa. When in labours Māyā remained leaning on the branch of a tree in the Lumbinī garden. In that posture she gave birth to Sarvārthaśiddha. On that day the Śākya had born unto them five hundred sons, including Sundarananda and others, five hundred daughters including Yaśodharā &c., five hundred horses, the same number of slaves and elephants ; they also obtained the same number of diamonds and hoards. Suddhodana sent a palankin made by the hands of Viśvakarmā to bring the mother and the son to the palace.

When Buddha was born, all creatures obtained what they wanted, from which circumstance he was called Sarvārthaśiddha “the gratifier of every wish." No sooner was the price brought to the palace, than the king sent for learned astrologers to cast his nativity. They unanimously declared the child would be a 'great man,' a Mahāpuruṣa. He, they declared, had all the thirty-two signs of greatness, such as Samā or symmetry, Hṛishṭā or stoutness, Dirghā, tallness, Āyatā or broad-chestedness, Upasakha &c. The astrologers assured the king that at the time of the prince's birth the diadems of the gods had fallen from their heads.

Asita, a Brāhman of Ujjayinī in Dakṣiṇāpatha, who was well versed in the mysteries of the Vedas, who had renounced the world, who had lived long on the Vindhya mountain, practising austerities as a hermit, came from the Himālaya, his recent lodge, to see the Bodhisattva. He descended before the boy from the aerial regions, and began to weep. "O, what a wretch am I," cried the old man, "I shall not be able to avail myself of the sublime teaching of this boy ! So old am I, that I am sure to perish before he commences preaching the doctrine of Nirvāṇa. I am sure he will become a great Buddha. The signs are clear and distinct ; the marks deep and indubitable. There are eighty characteristics which indicate a future Buddha, and I discern them all on this little boy. Unfortunate that I am, I shall not see the miracles wrought, the austerities practised, and the difficulties surmounted by him on his way to Nirvāṇa !"

First Meditation of Sarvārthasiddha.—Once on a time king Śuddhodana went by one of his parks with his family. The prince took a walk beyond the park, and entered a village inhabited by husbandmen. He saw a serpent and frog. He startled the serpent, and it devoured the frog. This convinced the prince of the evanescent character of everything mundane. Under the shadow of a rose-apple tree he fell into a deep meditation. Five Rishis, who were passing through the air, were suddenly stopped in their course as soon as they came over his head. They could not proceed further in spite of all their endeavours. They were quite at a loss as to the reason of this strange phenomenon. But they soon came to learn that a Bodhisattva was in meditation below. They chanted a gāthā, turned round, and went another way.

The king at his meal enquired after Sarvārthasiddha. He was nowhere to be found. The chamberlain searched after him from grove to grove, but to no purpose. At last he was discovered holding a meditation under the rose-apple tree, and the most strange sight was, that the shadow of the tree had not forsaken him though the sun had gone from the east to the west. The king, when this was reported to him, ran to the spot, fell on his knees, and praised his son in hymns.

Yaśodharā's Blushing.—But he entertained an apprehension that his son would take the first opportunity to renounce the world. The best means to provide against that contingency would be, he thought, to marry him as soon as possible. From this motive, he invited all the Sākya girls to his park. Among the rest came Yaśodharā, the accomplished daughter of Mahānāmā alias Subhūti. The king appointed his son to receive these girls, and to offer them presents of rich dresses. Yaśodharā, when the prince came to him, blushed. Her blushing was explained in the following way :

There lived in former times Nārada, a Brāhmaṇa of the family of Kauśika, at Vārāṇasī. Having found by bitter experience that the thirst for temporal enjoyment would never come to an end, he entered the monastic life, and practised Yogas at the foot of the Himālaya. He succeeded so far as to work miracles, and to learn the "five experiences." But he was still found deficient in "the art of apportioning" (Saṁvi-bhāja). To teach him this, Indra came from heaven, with the sun, the moon and Mātuli in his company. They demanded victuals from Kauśika. Nārada, telling at the same time that heaven is gained by alms, and hell by withholding the same. Kauśika promised to set every day, without fail, a portion of his food for the needy. Hīrī, the daughter of Indra, fall in love with Nārada, and her cheeks reddened at the sight of the Rishi. Hīrī was Yaśodharā and Nārada, Buddha.

Yaśodharā's Revenge.—At the grand party aforesaid, prince Sarvārthaśiddha presented rich clothes to all the assembled girls. He gave a ring and many valuables to Yaśodharā, but still she was not satisfied. Why ? Because in one of their former existences, he and she were the banished prince and princess of Kāśī. The prince caught a guana, and asked his wife to cook it. She declined. The prince was obliged to dress it for himself. But when it was ready, the princess expressed her desire to partake of the dish, and her husband managed to deprive her of her share by swallowing it while she had been away to fetch some water. The princess, in her subsequent existence, as Yaśodharā, avenged her wrong.

Yaśodharā's Choice.—Though she was certain that the prince would renounce the world, yet Yaśodharā rejected the hands of Sundara-nanda and Devadatta. The reason is, that once on a time the beasts, in a large assembly at the foot of the snowy range, wanted to elect a king to govern them. It was settled that, whoever should reach the mountain in seven days should be their king. All ran towards the mountain. But a tigress won the prize. A female on the throne was an idea repugnant to the beasts, and so they requested her to choose a husband who should rule them. A bull wooed her in vain ; an elephant courted her with no better success ; but a lion married her. The tigress was Yaśodharā, the bull Sundarananda, the elephant Devadatta, and the lion Buddha.

Trial of Strength.—When the girls had been dismissed, Śuddhodana learned from his ministers that Yaśodharā had made a deep impression on the prince's mind. A negotiation for marriage was immediately set on foot with Yaśodharā's father. But Mahānāmā declined their offer on the score of Survārthaśiddha's ignorance of the science of war, and also on the score of his want of artistic skill. Sudhodana was greatly mortified at this repulse. The prince, being apprised of the reason of the king's distress, caused a proclamation to be made throughout the city inviting youths to show their excellence in feats of strength. There was a large gathering on the day appointed. A furious elephant entered that day one of the gates of Kapilavastu. Devadatta killed it by a slap with his open hand ; but, unable to remove the carcass, he had to double it. Sundarananda could only drag it a few paces to clear the way. But Sarvārthaśiddha threw it beyond the seven walls of Kapilavastu. In another trial Devadatta's arrow pierced two palm trees, and reached the third. Sundarananda's arrow pierced three trees and reached the fourth, while the prince's arrow not only pierced through seven trunks, had passed on to the nether world. Moreover he made use of a certain Siṃhadhanu's bow, which none of his contemporaries could string.

Story of Dharmapāla.—Certain Bhikshus requested the Lord to kindly explain to them how he came to recognize the long lost descendants of the Śākyas, or Śākiyamushtis. The Lord said there was nothing new in it to wonder at. Brahmāyuh was a priest to the king of Vārāṇasī, and Dharmapāla was his son. He placed his son under the tuition of an Āchārya on the Himālaya. At a short distance from the school there was a large tank inhabited by a dragon. When Dharmapāla plunged into the tank for bathing, the monster dragged him in. Dharmapāla cultivated the friendship of a serpent prince who dwelt at the bottom of the tank, and instructed his subjects in the ten Karmapāṭhas. The monster, when dragging in Dharmapāla, had killed another boy whose remains lay floating upon the water. The tutor, supposing the remains to be those of Dharmapāla, carefully collected them, and forthwith proceeded to Vārāṇasī to inform Dhar-mapāla's father of the sad accident. Brahmāyah assured the tutor that Dharmapāla was alive and that the remains were those of another. He feasted the tutor with every care, and sent him back to the Himālaya, where, to his great surprise, the tutor saw Dharmapāla sitting in in his hermitage. "I am that priest, and Rāhula as Dharmapāla," said the Lord.

Proficiency in Archery.—The Bhikshus enquired how the lord could shoot his arrow to so great distance, as adverted to above. The Lord said. "This is not the first time I have done so. I had been, in one of my previous existences a king of Vārāṇasī. My empire extended to Takshaśilā. Once on a time I appointed my brother as my lieutenant at Vārāṇasī, and marched to Takshaśilā to suppress a revolt there. While absent from my capital it was besieged by a neighbouring prince. Instead of hastening to the relief of the capital, I aimed an arrow at my enemy who had his left foot pierced by it. I also contrived to attach a letter to the arrow threatening his life unless he instantly quitted my territories. He did not stop a moment after the perusal of my letter, but immediately broke up his encampment. It is not, therefore, at all extraordinary that I should be able to send an arrow to the nether region in my present existence."

Proficiency in Art. Story of Mahaushadha and Amarā.—In reply to the query why Yaśodhara was gained by a display of skill in manual arts, the Lord remarked that he had done so before, and illustrated the fact by the following story. Two miles from Mithilā there was a village named Javakachchha, where Mahaushadha, a Brāhmaṇ, had his residence. He wanted to obtain the hand of a blacksmith's daughter, named Amarā. But the blacksmith would not consent to marry his daughter to one not acquainted with any manual art. The Brāhmaṇ, thereupon, tried hard to acquire an art, and subsequently exhibited so much dexterity in needle-work that the blacksmith was glad to give his daughter in marriage to him. That Brāhmaṇ was Sarvarthasiddha, and Amarā, his wife Yaśodharā in a former life.

Proficiency in Prowess. Story of a Vedic Student and Sīrī.—To the question why Yaśodharā had to be gained by prowess, the following story was related to furnish a reply. A learned Brāhmaṇ of Vāravārī got an invitation from Samudrapattana. After the perusal of the latter he told his five hundred disciples that any one of them who could go to Samudrapattana would be rewarded with the hand of Sīrī, his daughter. One of the students, who was in love with Sīrī determined not to lose this golden opportunity. He volunteered to go, reached Samudrapattana, obtained valuable presents ; but on his voyage back to Vāravārī, his travelling bag, containing the presents, fell into the ocean. Unable to bear the idea of losing such a magnificent prize as Sirī, he determined to recover his bag by draining the sea, and set with all his might and main to the work. This induced the Devas, the Nāgas, the Yakshas and the Rākshasas of the ocean to restore him his bag. Buddha was that bold and persevering student, and Sirī Yaśodharā.

Story of Suchandrima Kinnarī.—In illustration of the fact that Sarvārthāsiddha had always to submit to great difficulty in obtaining the hands of Yaśodharā, he related the following story. Once on a time, Suchandrima, a king of Siñhapura, undertook, by the advice of a Brāhmaṇ, the celebration of a grand sacrifice, in which he intended to immolate one of every species of animal. Several hundreds of hunters were employed to catch wild beasts. When everything was ready, he invited learned Rishis, who travelled by the aerial way, to superintend the arrangement of the materials. They unanimously declared that a Kinnarī was wanting. The hunters were ordered to fetch a Kinnarī. One of them went to the Himalaya in search, and lodged in the hermitage of the Rishi Kāśyapa.

All of a sudden he heard a tiny note of celestial music. He enquired of the Rishi whence it came. Being told that a Kinnara Princess, named Manoharā, came every day to a lotus tank close by, and being advised that she could be caught only by means of truth, the wily hunter preceeded to the tank, and, by telling a truth, managed to capture the maiden. Rājā Suchandrima, now furnished with the full complement of animals, invited his friend Sabāhu, the Lord of Hastinā, to the sacrifice. Subāha deputed his youthful son Sudhanusha to the sacrifice. The young prince, at the very first sight, fell in love with the Kinnarī, and found to his great satisfaction that his feelings were reciprocated. He repaired to the king Suchandrima, and repented to him the sin and impiety of slaughtering so many thousands of innocent animals. He discoursed long on the merits of Ahinśā, and, at last succeeded in incuding the king to set the animals at liberty, and to put an end to the sacrifice. The king dismissed the assembled Brāhmaṇa, with valuable presents. The prince returned in company of Manoharā, the Kinnarī to Hastināpura, where he had long been associated by his father in the government of the kingdom. But the prince, in the company of the beautiful lady, neglected his official duties. This being reported to the aged king, he quietly dismissed the Kinnarī from the palace. She directed her steps towards the Himālaya. On the banks of the Śatadrū she cultivated the friendship of Utpalaka and Mānavaka, two hunter boys, put in their hands of precious ring and a garland with fragrant earth as tokens, and requested them, if the prince ever came after her, to tell him the way she had taken.

In the absence of his beloved one, the prince languished, and pined away. The palace, the city, the harem, pleased him not. The king tried to afford consolation, but failed. One night the prince stole away from the royal residence, and, attended only by one servant, directed his course to Kinnarapura. He met the hunter boys on the Śatadrū ; and they handed over to him the Kinnari's mementos. Unmindful of their remonstrance he proceeded through the hills and forests, his guide on the way being the tokens which had been left here and there by Manoharā for the purpose. After much difficulty he safely reached Kāśyapa's Āśrama. Kāśyapa ordered a huge monkey to convey him to Niratī, the capital of Manohara's father. The monkey placed him on its shoulders, and, jumping from peak to peak, from mountain to mountain, carried him safe to the capital. There the prince contrived to put his ring into the water-pot of one of Manoharā's handmaids. The ring happened to fall before Manoharā's eyes. She instantly concluded the prince's appearance in the city, and apprised her father of it. The king gave a hearty welcome to the prince, his son-in-law. After some time, the prince expressed his desire of returning to his own country. On awaking one morning he found himself in Hastināpura with his wife. Yambhaka, one of his father-in-law's messengers, had conveyed them while asleep through the region of air. There were no bounds to the joys of the people of Hastinā at the re-appearance of their lost prince. Sabāhu was Suddhodana ; his wife, Māyā ; Utpala, the hunter boy ; Rāhula, Mānavaka the other hunter ; Ananda, the monkey Aśvarāja ; Druma, Manoharā's father Mahānāmā ; Manoharā, Yāsodharā ; and Sudhanusha, Sarvārthasiddha himself.*

Sākya's Early Life.—During his residence in Srāvastī the Lord, one day, recalled to his mind what his mission on earth was, and addressed his Bhikshus on the subject of his early life.

When he was young his father erected for him three buildings, and supplied them with the richest furniture. They were suited to the three seasons of the year—places for wantonness, pastime and pleasure. But Sarvārthasiddha's firm conviction was that the householder's state was a state of sinfulness, without a break. He who would prepare himself for hermitage or pravrajyā should not stay in his family ; knowing this he renounced the world, severing all ties of relationship, and leaving behind him the inheritance of a mighty empire. His parents wept, but could not make any impression on a mind bent on religious excellence, or the attainment of Bodhi knowledge. From Kapilavastu he proceeded to Vaisālī. There lived a Jina, named Arāḍhakālāma, who had three hundred Śrāvakas. His doctrine was "abandon whatever you see" [lit. "see, see, and abandon, abandon"]. Sarvārthasiddha conceived a high opinion of the doctrine, and applied to the teacher for admission as a pupil. But his pupilage was short. The Jina said "my religion is such that a faithful, noble, hearted man might practice Brahmacharya, and at the same time learn to honor the holy ways to bliss." This did not satisfy the inward cravings of the prince for a complete and absolute destruction of all mundane pains. He left Vaisālī for Rājagriha, where Rudraka, son of Rāma, dwelt. He had seven hundred Śrāvakas under him. His doctrine too did not please the prince, who next went to the mount Gayāśirsha. There three ideas struck him, viz., 1st, that a Brāhmaṇ, or a Śramaṇa, who wants to attain the Bodhi knowledge by the exertion of his body and mind, both impure, is like one who wants to produce fire by the rubbing of two bits of wood immersed in water : both are equally doomed to experience the acute pangs of disappointment. 2nd, As a man cannot produce fire by rubbing a dry piece of wood against a wet piece, so a Brāhmaṇ cannot attain the highest knowledge by purifying his body, when his heart remains impure. 3rd, Even as fire can be produced by rubbing two dry pieces of wood, so is the Bodhi knowledge attainable by the union of the body and the mind, both equally stainless. Contemplating over these analogies he reached the village of Uruvilvā. There in solitude flowed the pure and limpid stream of Nairanjanā. The scenery delighted the hermit greatly. He determined to make that place his abode, and the scene of his salvation.

Having taken this resolution he attempted to restrain his kāyas or sensations, and also his chitta or mind, by means of meditation. Then he commenced the most difficult meditation called Āsphānaka-dhyāna, i.e., meditation by restraining his breath from escaping through the nostrils and the mouth. Having no other outlet his breath passed through the ears, making a sound like that of bellows. When he restrained his breath through those passages also, it rushed upwards, and, breaking open his scalp, escaped. Some advised him to live on one plum a day. It weakened him greatly. Some advised him to live on a single grain of rice a day, some on a grain of sesamum, some advised him absolute fast, and so on. He found that by these austerities he was getting emaciated ; that his strength was departing ; his beauty fading ; his complexion growing pale and haggard. He concluded, that was not the right way to gain the Bodhi knowledge. He had felt, he thought, far greater delight at home when he fell into a deep meditation under the rose-apple tree. That, he believed, was the right method of obtaining the highest bliss. So he took a bath in the pure and cooling stream of the Nairanjanā ; regained his health by wholesome diet ; obtained, by begging, a handful of hay from a dealer in corn ; scattered it round the Bodhi Tree ; turned thrice round the Tree from the right ; and sat below it, recalling to mind every thing in the world.

On that very day, in the still awful moments of midnight, Śuddhodana saw, in a dream, his darling son in the form of an elephant, riding on a brilliant fig tree resplendent with jewels. Pearls, rubies and precious stones covered him from head to foot. He stood in the middle of a broad street of the city, where people flocked from all quarters, even at that dead of night, to anoint him.

Yaśodharā dreamt of a bright piece of cloud, glowing like lightning with tremulous light, pouring a refreshing shower over the three regions, and delighting the whole animal creation with the music of its roar. She dreamt also that Brahmā was explaining the dream to her.

Bodhisattva himself saw five visions : in one of them he saw that the whole earth was his couch ; Sumeru, red like the Vimba fruit, his pillow ; his right hand resting on the eastern, his left on the western, and his legs on the southern, ocean. In a second he saw Śthirikās, a kind of grass, shooting from his navel, covered the whole face of the heavens.

Suddenly the events of his householder life recurred to his memory. He remembered his asking the permission of his father to enter the hermitage, and the affectionate tears of that aged father, imploring him to stay at home, at least, to the end of his own life. He remembered, also, that at the time of this conversation Śuddhodana thought of placing him in a magnificent palace in the midst of bewitching beauties, fascinating girls, charming celestial damsels. Śuddhodana actually performed what he thought. But nothing could tempt the virtuous soul, bent only upon the final and complete deliverance of himself. The prince only longed for that sort of delight which he had experienced under the rose-apple tree. Neither music, nor dance, nor the beauty of youth could, in his estimation, produce such a thrilling delight as that deep meditation afforded. The deity presiding over the Lumbinī forest, in an invisible shape, gave the first intimation to the king of the mental distress of his beloved son. The heart of the aged monarch melted away at the sight of the lifeless emaciated complexion of Sarvārthasiddha. With tears at the sight of the lack-lustre countenance, the aged man asked him, if there was anything wrong with him, if he entertained any fear of the loss of his wealth, or of an invasion from an enemy. The prince replied, he saw everything wrong with him; "because", said he, "I constantly find that disease creeps upon health, and death steals away life. Life passes away, and death comes nearer every year. "There is loss of wealth, because all the religions of the world are false, foolish, contradictory. They are a stumbling-block to the accumulation of our wealth, viz., spiritual wealth. There is fear of the enemy, for false reformation in religion produces misery, and that reformation is our enemy. I can stay at home if you can guarantee that youth should not be followed by imbecility, health ruined by disease, life destroyed by death."

Suddhodana again thought of quieting his son's mind by agreeable female company. But the prince expressed his desire to proceed to a park. Immediately the streets were strewn with flowers, and the prince, in a gorgeous procession, proceeded to the park. Every care was taken to keep away the blind, the maimed, the lame, the old, and the dead, from his sight; but a potter, the son of Ghaṭikāra, a Suddhābāsa Devaputra, placed in the way an extremely old man, weak, pale, and tottering, leaning for support upon a crutch.

At the sight of this miserable creature, Sarvārthasiddha fell into a melancholy vein of thought. Old age and misery, thought he, are inseparable from the state of man. The sufferings of the old man made so deep an impression on his mind that he could not proceed on his journey; he ordered his charioteer to drive homewards. On another occasion, the sight of a man labouring under various diseases made him stop his journey to another park, and return home. The sight of a dead body was enough, on another day, to send him back from his way to a third park. On the fourth time, when he attempted to go to a fourth park, he fell in with a Bhikshu. The prince asked him the reason of his renouncing the world. The reply was "for the restraint, quietude, and annihilation of the soul." The prince was greatly delighted at the answer. Just at this moment a Chakravāka cried aloud —“blessed is your father, blessed your mother, and blessed the girl whom you have married.” This Chakravāka afterwards became Mṛigī, the mother of Ānanda.

The king prepared for anointing his son as second king, under the auspicious star Pushyā ; but the prince thought that was the most auspicious moment for entering the hermitage. The gods and the Devaputras encouraged him in his purpose. At the moment of midnight, when Rāhula descended from his mother’s womb, the prince surveyed his seraglio, got disgusted at the indecent picture it presented and finally took leave of the world. At a retired place (Anāseyasthāna), 96 miles from Kapilavastu, in the kingdom of the Mallas, in the vicinity of the Āśrama of Vaśishṭha, the prince dismissed his servant Chaṇḍaka with Kaṇṭaka, his horse. He exchanged his silken robe for an ochre-colored vestment, and cut off his crown-lock (chūḍā).

Story of Syāmā and Vajrasena.—The reason why Buddha abandoned his faithful wife Yaśodharā is given in the following story.

There was in times of yore a horse-dealer at Takshasilā, named Vajrasena; on his way to the fair at Vārāṇasī, his horses were stolen, and he was severely wounded. As he slept in a deserted house in the suburbs of Vārāṇasī, he was caught by policemen as a thief. He was ordered to the place of execution. But his manly beauty attracted the attention of Syāmā, the first public woman in Vārāṇasī. She grew enamoured of the man, and requested one of her handmaids to rescue the criminal at any hazard. By offering large sums of money, she succeeded in inducing the executioners to set Vajrasena free, and execute the orders of the king on another, a banker’s son, who was an admirer of Syāmā. The latter, not knowing his fate, approached the place of execution with victuals for the criminal, and was severed in two by the executioners.

The woman was devotedly attached to Vajrasena. But her inhuman conduct to the banker’s son made a deep impression on his mind. He could not reconcile himself to the idea of being in love with the perpetrator of such a crime. On an occasion when they both set on a pluvial excursion, Vajrasena plied her with wine, and when she was almost senseless, smothered and drowned her. When he thought she was quite dead, he dragged her to the steps of the ghat and fled, leaving her in that helpless condition. Her mother, who was at hand, came to her rescue, and by great assiduity resuscitated her. Syāmā’s first measure, after recovery, was to find out a Bhikṣuṇī of Takshasilā, and to send through her a message to Vajrasena, inviting him to her loving embrace. Buddha was that Vajrasena, and Syāmā, Yaśodharā.

Story of a Serpent-catcher.—The Lord said he was at another time saved by Yaśodharā. He was then a king of the serpents, living at Vārāṇasī. On the eighth, the fourteenth and the fifteenth day of the moon, he used to fast and remain motionless at a place where four roads met. On one of these occasions he was caught by a serpent-catcher. He had many wives, but none succeeded in rescuing him. The chief of them proceeded boldly to the king of Vārāṇasī. Her pathetic appeals and eloquent description of her husband's virtues moved the king, who immediately ordered the serpent-catcher, on pain of death, to set the serpent-king free ; that chief queen was Yaśodharā.

Sequel to the visions.—After the vision Buddha went to beg his food in Uruvilvā, where Sujātā, who was his mother in five hundred previous existences, feasted him with milk and honey. Rājā Śuddhodana, after the vision of the elephant, sent a man to the Uruvilvā grove to enquire after his son's health. The man saw him motionless in a trance, with his breath stopped, and concluded that he was dead. But the Rājā did not believe his report. The messenger, being sent again to the grove, found Buddha in perfect repose.

Story of Syāmaka.—It struck some of the audience as strange that the king should, from so great a distance, know better about his son's health than those who were around him. But this was explained by a reference to his previous history. He was, once on a time, a Brāhmaṇ who entered the third stage with his wife in company. At his hermitage on the banks of the Subhānjanī, in the neighbourhood of Gotama's hermitage, he had a child born unto him. The boy, named Syāmaka, was always dutiful to his parents. In fact he was the principal support in their old age. His filial love was so great that he could never take rest until after his parents had been properly served. The king of Vārāṇasī was very fond of hunting in Gotama's forest. In one of his hunting excursions he aimed an arrow at what appeared to him to be a stag, drinking in a river, but when it was too late he found out his error. It was the Brāhmaṇ's son, who had come to fetch water for his blind parents, that fell pierced by his weapon. The king hastened to his rescue. But the young man was on the point of death. He had time only to acquaint the king with the precarious position in which this unforeseen circumstance would reduce his beloved parents. In compliance with his dying request, the king carried his parents to his corpse, laid it before them, confessed his crime, and tried in various ways to afford them consolation. They wept bitterly for their affectionate child. At last the old Brāhmaṇ said he would revivify his son by telling the truth. His action was as good as his word. In a short time Syāmaka revived. Śuddhodana was formerly the father of Syāmaka.*

Story of Śiriprabha.—Buddha practised austerities at Uruvilvā ; his ardour was so great that he lived eighteen months on one plum a day, eighteen on one sesamum seed a day, eighteen on one grain of rice a day, and for eighteen months he took no food at all. His eyes sunk in their sockets, the sound of his breath was like that of bellows, his head became bare and white like an autumnal bottlegourd. Every member of his family grew anxious for his life. Yaśodharā, though at home, made it a point to lead an ascetic life. Henceforth she lived on simple food, and slept on the bare ground. Nor did she do this, said the Lord, in this life alone, but also in a previous existence. Yaśodharā always followed in the wake of her husband. She was then the fond hind to a loving stag who was named Śiriprabha. Her husband fell into the snare of one Lubdhaka, a hunter. The hind placed herself before the hunter, and requested him to kill her before killing her husband. Her fidelity saved her husband, for the hunter was too chivalrous to turn a deaf ear to the request of a chaste wife.

Story of Śakuntika, the fowler.—When holding deep meditation with austere fervour for final emancipation, Buddha had to resist strong temptations thrown in his way by Māra to seduce him. But the resolute devotee did not swerve in the least from the path he had selected. The love of emancipation was almost a part of his existence. Nor was this remarkable, said the Lord to his audience, for in his previous existences too he had hated bondage as he hated the devil. In one of these he was a fowl, and Māra a fowler. The fowler used carefully to rear his fowls, and, as soon as they grew fat, to kill them, and sell their flesh. Buddha, as the fowl, having observed this, carefully avoided eating anything, so he waxed weaker and weaker every day, so much so, that he could well slip down through the interstices of the cage in which he was confined. The fowler did not notice this incidence. In a short time, the fowl gained his master's confidence by appearing very tame and attached to him, and, when wholesome food restored him to strength, fled away.

* This story forms a part of the Daśaratha jātaka of Ceylon, and is there called Syāma Jātaka. The names and details are slightly different. The story is also told of the Hindu king Daśaratha in the Rāmāyaṇa. Antiquities of Orissa, 1, p. 90.

Story of a Tortoise.—In another existence Buddha was a tortoise and Māra a florist. When gathering flowers, Māra espied the tortoise, and succeeded in catching it. The tortoise, with unusual presence of mind, turned the florist's flower-basket upside down, and as soon as the florist hastened to collect his flowers, jumped into the water and escaped.

Story of a Porpoise.—Māra, in a third existence, was a porpoise in the sea, and Buddha a lord of monkeys living in a forest close to the sea-shore. Whenever the porpoise came on the shore the monkey-king kindly supplied him with fresh fruits from a glamorous fig tree. Thus close intimacy was formed between them. But their intimacy was an eyesore to the wife of the porpoise. She, on one occasion, feigned illness, and demanded from her husband, the heart of a monkey, alleging that a monkey's heart alone could cure her of her illness. The porpoise urged, how could an aquatic animal get the heart of a beast? She then pointed to his friend the monkey-king. The porpoise induced his friend, by telling stories of rich gardens on the other side of the sea, to cross it on his back. But in the midway he plunged into the water, dragging the monkey with him. The monkey, in alarm, asked his friend "what are you about?" The porpoise replied "my wife demands a monkey's heart." "You are mistaken, friend," said the monkey with the presence of mind characteristic of his species, "I have left my heart hanging on the fig tree on the sea-shore." The foolish porpoise believed what he said, and carried the monkey back to the forest, where he easily escaped from the murderous hand of his friend.

Story of a fowler and his prey.—Māra watched Buddha very closely for years, but could not discover a single flaw in his conduct. At last, to his great mortification, the wicked one had to desist from his attempts of tempting the staunch ascetic. In a former existence too Buddha, as a learned king of the fowls, frustrated, by his prudence, all the attempts to catch the birds living under his authority, which the fowler Māra made by scattering grains and by spreading his net.

Story of Surūpa, the deer king.—The Bhikshus asked the Lord why did he offer his flesh and blood for a Subhāshita, or good saying? The Lord replied, once on a time he lived, under the name of Surūpa, in a forest beyond the Himālaya, as the leader of a herd of wild deer. Indra, to try him, approached him in the guise of a hunter, and offered to recite a good saying if he could offer his life for it. He consented. The Subhāshita was :

वरं रेवं रूपानां सत्पुरुषाणां

पाद पांशु रजो न सौवर्णो पर्वतः ।

“The dust of a good man’s feet is preferable to a mountain of gold.” The former destroys while the latter increases our grief. Buddha kept his promise, and gave his body to the disguised hunter.

Character of Avalokita Vyākaraṇa.—The Lord, while sojourning on the Gridharakuṭa hill near Rājagriha, was requested by Nanda, a Devaputra, to recount what becomes manifest at the time when is attained true knowledge, technically the Avalokita Vyākaraṇa. Nanda was seconded by Sunanda, Sumata, Íśvara, Maheśvara and other Devaputras of pure inclinations and holy abode.

The purport of what Buddha said on this occasion is this :

When a Bodhisattva sees the finite from the shore of infinity, the Devaputras of pure abode acquire eighteen pleasing qualities, such as association of the past, reproduction of the past, production of the Yuga, production of the auspicious, production of the excellent, production of the ancient, production of the commendable, &c. The piece of ground whereon sitting a Bodhisattva kills great Yakshas, defeats large armies, saves the souls of multitudes of men, governs the hearts of men as a charioteer does his horses, should possess sixteen qualities. It should be purified by burning, provided with a seat at the centre. It should be situated far away from the haunts of men, in a country not governed by Mlechchas, and within the limits of Āryāvartta. It should be level, dry, full of flowering plants, well known, well protected, unconquered, no birth-place for an avatāra, unfrequented by Māra, like a throne in the earth, hard as adamant four fingers deep, a place where soft grass, green as a pigeon’s neck, grows in circles.

*Story of Jyotishpāla.—Jyotishpāla of Jyotishpa was Ananga, son of Baudhuma, who reigned at Baudhumati in the 91st Kalpa. Baudhuma, son of Vipāśyī, became a great Buddha. Once on a time the king invited his enlightened son to his capital to receive Buddha. But

* This story seems to be out of place, for it breaks the narrative of the Avalokita knowledge.

Ananga advanced several miles in a different direction to welcome the Lord, fell, prostrate at his feet, and requested him to dine at his house for three months. The Lord signified his consent by his silence. The king was greatly annoyed by Ananga's taking advantage of him. He remonstrated with him, but in vain. At last it was settled that they should feed the Lord with his whole congregation on alternate days for three months. When only two days of the fixed period remained, the king prohibited his subjects to sell anything to Ananga, on pain of death. Ananga had still one day to feed the Lord. He grew very anxious. But his anxiety was soon removed by Indra, who came in person to him, and offered to supply him with everything. Then he miraculously brought into existence wells of ghi and curds, he created a golden palm tree with silver leaves by the aid of Visvakarmā. The boon Ananga obtained for thus entertaining the Lord was proficiency in the knowledge of Buddha.

Avatokita Vyākaraṇa, continued.—Bodhisattva made use of thirty-two different standards of morality, and manifested five different smiles. He looked like a lion in five sorts of frowns. He gaped in five different ways ; coughed in five different styles. Then he held the first meditation, greatly delightful on account of the dispassion it produced. In this meditation he had doubts. In the second, he had no doubt. It was delightful to him through samādhi, or because it made his mind intent on his own emancipation. The third meditation afforded him great delight by recalling to his mind the contempt with which he had renounced the world. The fourth destroyed both pleasure and pain. It gave him equanimity of mind by doing away with mirth and melancholy consequent on pleasure and pain.

In the first prahara or watch of the night he concentrated his mind for the conception of knowledge with the aid of the celestial eye. He saw all, high caste or low caste people, the rich and the poor, in short he saw men of all denominations. In the second watch, he directed his thoughts to recal to mind his ancient abodes ; and in the last watch he reached his goal. He obtained perfect sambodhi, to which there is nothing superior in the world. It showed him what is misery, how it is produced, and in what way we can get rid of it. It pointed out to him what are the mundane pains, how produced, and how healed. It produced in his mind the impression that those who blindly believe that existence is only an evolution of the existent, suffer from misery and mundane pains. It held out before his mind's eye, as it were in a mirror, the process how these are produced and repressed. The delusion that existence is an evolution of the existent produces false intuitions, or those which give the conceptions of hunger, sleep &c. False intuitions are the causes of perceptions. From perceptions we arrive at the ideas of name and form, whence the sins of the senses have their rise. From these we have the sensation of touch (all other sensations being subordinate to touch). From sensation are produced the feelings of pain, and from these desire and will. From will proceeds materials. From these results the connection of the soul with body, birth, imbecility, death, grief, lamentation, misery and melancholy. Thus the long category of pains has its rise.* But he, who has faith in the doctrine of non-existence, i. e., existence is evolved from non-existence, from what the Naiyāyikas call Abhāba, has no delusion, and consequently no false intuition. The extensive fabric of misery, thus having its foundation undermined, falls to the ground. Bodhisattva remained for a week under the Bodhi tree during which millions of gods came to honor him.

Story of Bodhisattva's descent as a Nāga.—The Lord lived for a long time with a large congregation at the park Āmrāpālī in Vaiśālī. There Viśuddhamati, a Bhikshu, requested him to explain the Nāgavalokita. The Lord said a Jina, named Himaśāsī, descended from the Tushita heaven in the form of a Nāga, and was born heir to the king Shaḍvāshāṇa. In the 29th year of his age, he renounced the world. After 12 years of asceticism he entered the kingdom of Magadha where the daughter of a general honored him. He soon after became Buddha. After obtaining the Bodhi knowledge, he went to the banks of the Nairanjanā. The whole earth trembled under his steps. Then he returned to the Bodhi tree. The gods, who came to pay their respects to the Lord, saw the Bodhi tree. Some conceived it was 16 miles high, some thought it was thousands of miles high. Some thought it was decorated with pearls, some with rubies. Some saw a siṃhāsana upon it, others saw the siṃhāsana two hundred yojanas high.

After this follows a panegyric on virtuous conduct and then the story is continued thus :

When the serpent Kāla visited Buddha on the banks of the Nairanjanā, the lord exhibited his skill in working marvels for the deity Amritāśāna. When he assumed the form of a lion rampant, five hundred lions turned round him in reverence. In this way he successively assumed the forms of a serpent, an ox, and a cuckoo. The serpent praised the Lord in loud hymns. The Lord coughed. The sound killed Māra with all his attendants. He penetrated into the depth of Bodhi knowledge, and set the august wheel of virtue in motion.

Story of Kuśa.—When he appeared at Rājagriha, the Bhikshus asked him why the wicked Māra was destroyed by the coughing of the Lord. The following story of Kuśa was related in reply.*

Once on a time, there reigned at Vārāṇasi, a king named Subandhu. All of a sudden his bed-chamber miraculously turned into a sugarcane plantation. One came among the rest was so refreshing to the eye that the king called some astrologer in, to ascertain what was in it. They predicted that a son was to be born to the king from the cane. In time the cane swelled to the size of a bamboo. One morning a boy issued forth from the sugarcane tree, and he was named Ikshvāku, or the sugarcane-born. The boy was nourished by the chief lady of the royal seraglio. On the death of Subandhu, Ikshvāku became king. He had many queens, of whom Alindā was the chief. Even to an advanced age the king was childless. He consulted holy men for getting a child. Their advice was to open the seraglio thrice every fortnight to the public use. All, except Alindā, took advantage of this liberty, and, leaving the palace at night, went wherever they liked. One of Subandhu's near relations held the post of Indra in the thirty-third heaven. Indignant at the unworthy and shameful conduct of Ikshvāku, he transformed himself into an old decrepit dirty Brāhmaṇ suffering from a loathsome cough. He managed to throw himself at the royal presence, and begged to have a queen for dalliance. The king gave him the choice of his seraglio, and he selected Alindā. The Brāhmaṇ dragged the chief Queen of the palace, in spite of her stubborn opposition, to an old dilapidated building in the suburb. Alindā had to wash his feet, and to stand before him in complete nudity. But she would never consent to prostitute her body. In the morning Indra threw off his disguise, expressed his satisfaction at her conduct, and rewarded her firmness by placing some drugs in her hands. "This will," said he, "remove your barrenness. I grant this boon in accordance with your own desire. Dissolve this powder into water, and take the solution. Your son will be active and energetic, but since you did not respond to my loving call, he will be like ugliness personified." Alindā gave a full account of this incident to her husband, and he made the whole seraglio use the medicine. The quantity of solution was so small and the number of ladies so great that they had to take it in homoeopathic doses by using the sharp end of a kuśa blade for their measure-glass. Five hundred children were born to the king. He named them after the kuśa grass Indrakuśa, Devakuśa &c. The ugly child of Alindā was named simply Kuśa or, as some say, Suddhakuśa. He was no favourite with the king, who made several attempts to disinherit him. All the king's endeavours were defeated by the activity and energy of Kuśa. On one occasion, the king concealed a small ball of sweetmeat under a big heap of large ones, and declared that any one of his sons who could discover the small ball would be made king. Kuśa was given the last chance, but that only served to make the work easier to him. On another occasion the king promised to nominate him his successor who could eat the fastest. All waited for dishes to be brought to them, but Kuśa took his meal on the bare ground, and was, in spite of the king's reluctance, nominated his successor. Finding that Kuśa had on him the signs of royalty, the king determined to frustrate his hopes of ascending the throne by concealing his wealth, and by declaring in enigmatic terms at the time of his death where he had concealed them. The king thought Kuśa would not be able to solve the enigmas, and that any other son who could get the wealth would get the kingdom also. On his accession Kuśa collected all the wealth by solving the enigmas. One of these enigmas, for instance, was Yojananidhi or eight-mile hoard. But Kuśa dug a portion of the stable where horses were harnessed, guessing from the word Yuj "to yoke" that the stables were meant, and got the wealth.

Mahendraka, the tribal king of Bhadrakasat in Kānyakubja, had a very beautiful daughter. Alindā immediately after Kuśa's accession, set a negotiation on foot for her son's marriage to that princess. The match was soon settled. The nuptials were celebrated with great pomp by proxy at Kānyakubja. But Alindā was apprehensive lest her fair daughter-in-law would commit suicide at the sight of so deformed a husband. She, therefore, prepared rooms underground where, under the plea of family customs, she placed the young couple. No light was admitted into the room. The couple enjoyed their honey-moon in the dark. But Sudarśanā, the princess, grew impatient to see her beloved husband, and urged her mother-in-law to bring about an interview in the light. Alindā, to avoid Sudarśanā's seeing the ugly husband, made one of her step-sons personate Kuśa on the throne, while the real Kuśa with his thick lips, corpulent belly, deformed head, held the royal umbrella. Sudarśanā was well pleased with her supposed husband, but she expressed her indignation at so black and ugly a person being allowed to hold the parasol. On one occasion when walking in the royal park she fled from him as from a monster.

But in a short time, her mistake was corrected. At a great conflagration of the city the elephant park was saved, simply by the activity of the king. He was for some time in every body's mouth. They described him as very black, with large red eyes, &c. Sudarśanā then found out her error. She learned, to her great surprise and grief, that the monster at the park was her real husband. She instantly begged the permission of her mother-in-law to proceed to Kānyakubja. The permission was granted, and she set out for Kānyakubja to hide her shame.

The king, unable to bear the separation, appointed one of his half-brothers as regent, and proceeded himself to the north with a Vinā in his hand. On his arrival at Kānyakubja his first measure was to apprise Sudarśanā of his presence in the city. By his skill in the culinary art, he soon got himself appointed at the royal kitchen. There in private he tried to persuade his refractory wife, but to no purpose. She was inexorable.

In the meanwhile, the scandal of Sudarśanā's leaving, and in a way divorcing, her husband spread far and wide. Seven feudatories of the king of Kānyakubja offered to marry her. But their offers were indignantly rejected by the king. They made a common cause with one another, and advanced to seize the capital. The king, in wrath scolded his refractory daughter, and threatened to cut her into seven pieces for these seven rebels, if he got worsted in the coming conflict. Sudarśanā, trembling with fear at so terrible a threat, had now recourse to her almost divorced husband at the kitchen. He promised to save her, and to fight her father's cause. The king was now told of his son-in-law's appointment as a cook. He hastened to receive him, and, heaping honors upon honors on him, made up for all his former neglect. The hero advanced on an elephant and towards his enemies, and by a shout at the onset so quailed their spirit that they surrendered themselves his captives. The king gave them each a daughter at the request of Kuśa. After enjoying his triumph for a few days at Kānyakubja, Kuśa set out in the company of his humbled wife for his own kingdom. On his way, he looked at his own image reflected in a glassy brook, and was so much disgusted at his deformity that he wanted to drown himself. But just at that time Indra manifested himself before him, and presented him a garland set with the rare jewel called Jyotīrasa. "Put this on, and it will make you," said Indra, "the most beautiful man on earth. When you wish to assume your own form, cover this with your clothes and your beauty will be hidden." Kuśa put on the jewel, and Sudarśanā was transported with delight, when she found her husband blessed with a celestial form.

Buddha was Kuśa ; Mahendraka, the king of Kānyakubja, was Mahānāmā ; Māyā was Alindā ; Sudarśanā was Yaśodharā ; Māra and his companions were the seven rebel kings.

At the request of the Bhikshus the Lord explained to them why Kuśa was born so ugly. He said, in one of his previous existences, he was Sudarśana, and had a very loving wife. In his absence, she entertained a Pratyeka Buddha with dainty food. Vexed at the sight of a young man in his wife's company, he railed at them. His wife told him to put a stop to his raileries, adverting to the holy character of the guest, and called heaven to witness that there was nothing wrong in her. The Pratyeka Buddha, too, to convince the householder of his sacred character, fled like a flamingo through the sky. This set at rest the suspicions of Sudarśana ; he begged his wife's pardon, fell into a profound meditation, and wished to have the faithful lady for his wife in the next existence. Sudarśanā was that faithful wife. Her husband was ugly, because he had entertained unbecoming suspicions against a Pratyeka Buddha.

Stories of Māra's attempts to seduce Buddha.—The question was asked, Why could not Māra find a single flaw in the Lord's conduct, though he watched carefully for several years ? The Lord said, this was not the only time he had so failed ; once on a time the leader of a wild herd of cattle was followed long by a wily jackal who wanted to have the ox's flesh, but the ox proved more cunning than the jackal, and escaped. The ox was Buddha and the jackal Māra. This story is called Vrishabha Jātaka.

Buddha was at another time a leader of a troop of monkeys and Māra a marine monster who devoured every one of the monkey troop which happened to come to the water side. The gradual decrease of the number of his troop attracted the attention of the leader. After a careful investigation he found the footprints of monkeys leading to the water side were far greater than those returning from it. He immediately published a mandate prohibiting his troop from going to the water side, and thus saved all further destruction. This story is called Vānara Jātaka.

In another existence the Lord escaped from the snares of Māra, and made him experience a sad disappointment in the following manner. Māra was a serpent, and Buddha a leader of monkeys. The monkey-chief fell once into the lake where the serpent dwelt. The serpent, to devour him, raised his head high above the water. The subtle monkey instantly addressed the serpent, saying, "I would be no adequate food for you, but see yonder there is a large troop of monkeys." As soon as the stupid serpent turned his head to see the troop, the monkey put one of his legs on his head and at one leap reached the shore. This story is called Vānara Jātaka.

Story of Punyavanta and his friends.—For several successive existences the Lord was a lover of virtue. In one of these he was Punyavanta son of Anjana, a king of Vārāṇasī. He had four friends, all sons of high officials. They were Viryyavanta, Śilpavanta, Rūpavanta, and Prajñāvanta ; their names showing their peculiar excellences. The five friends set out on a journey to Kāmpilya in order to test the usefulness of their respective excellences. They found a block of timber floating on the river. Viryyavanta, or he who was possessed of great strength, volunteered to bring it to the bank. He succeeded. The timber, to his great advantage, proved to be sandal-wood. The proceeds from its sale, a hundred thousand pieces of gold, were distributed among the friends. They were very glad, and they loudly praised the advantages of strength.

Śilpavanta, or he who was skilled in the fine arts, then took up a Vinā or harp, and sitting in a corner of the city began to play upon it. The charm of his performance drew crowds around him. It was soon found that he had no match in the city. The Vinā had seven cords, but such was the dexterity of Śilpavanta that when one of these was broken, the same melting music proceeded from the remaining six cords. He managed to perform the same tone even when there was only one chord left in the instrument. He obtained large rewards for his skill. These he shared with his friends, who were all loud in the praise of artistic skill.

The charm of Rūpavanta's beauty captivated the heart of the first public woman at Kāmpilya. At the bidding of her fascinating paramour, the woman gave large sums of money to his friends, and they all acknowledged the excellence of beauty.

It was now the turn for Prajñāvanta, or wise man, to show his worth. He went to a market place where he found a banker's son quarrelling with a public woman for a sum of money, a hundred karaṇḍas. The banker's son had called in the woman the night before, and had offered her the sum of money in question as her fee for the night. But she had other engagements, and therefore had to decline the offer, promising to come in the morning. In the morning she was told that the banker's son was in no want of her company as he had enjoyed it in a dream. The woman then laid her claim to the money on the ground that it was with her that he had passed the night. The quarrel grew, and there was none who could bring it to an amicable conclusion. Prajñāvanta offered his mediation. He ordered the money to be brought in, placed a mirror before it, and commanded the public woman to take the money within the mirror. "It is your shadow" said the subtle arbitrator, "that he enjoyed in a dream, and you are entitled to a shadow ; how can you expect real and tangible money in return. Take the money reflected in the mirror." The woman was put out of countenance, and the banker's son, flushed with success, gave a heap of gold to Prajñāvanta, who called in his friends to partake of his gains.

The meek and virtuous Punyavanta planted himself before the royal palace. A minister's son, charmed with his simplicity, sought his friendship. Punyavanta was lodged in a part of the king's residence. When he slept there, he was waited upon by the king's daughter, who felt an affection for him. The royal officers, having discovered the princess in the company of a stranger brought the stranger to the king. On investigation Punyavanta proved innocent. His high lineage too remained no longer concealed. He was married to the Princess of Kāmpilya, and was appointed heir to the kingdom.

Soṇaka was Viryavanta in his previous existence. Rāshṭrapāla was Śilpavanta, Sūrendra was Rupavanta. Śāriputra was Prajñāvanta.

Story of Vijitāri.—In another existence the Lord suffered greatly for his love of virtue. He was then the open-handed munificent king Vijitāri of Mithilā. His ministers and friends combined to banish him from the kingdom in order to prevent the drain on the royal treasury on account of his reckless donations. He lived in the midst of a forest in the Himālaya, where Indra came to try his sincerity. In a long speech, Indra pointed out to the ex-king the disadvantages of reckless munificence. He produced a hell before the king where all the sufferers were extravagant donors. But all these could not produce the least change in the king's mind, and he declared that it was better to suffer in hell than to see people suffering in the world. Well pleased at the declaration, Indra went to heaven, where he commanded the clouds never to let a drop of water fall on Mithilā. The famine-stricken Maithilese restored their banished king to the throne, and the drought was at an end.

Story of Kāśpaya's retirement from home.—When the lord was living on the bank of the tank Karaṇḍaka, Mahākāśyapa gave a complete history of the state of his mind before taking the Pravrajyā. The state of a householder appeared to him to be a state of sinfulness and bondage, Brahmacharya appeared to be pure and stainless. He renounced the world, and an accident brought him in contact with Buddha, who gave him instruction. Buddha taught him to carefully guard his mind from the allurements of the senses. He told him to see with his eyes, to smell with his nose, to taste with his tongue, to touch with his skin, but never to consider the objects of the senses to be realities, for belief in the reality of sensuous objects brought forth misery, pain and melancholy.

Story of Sāriputra.—Four miles from Rājagriha there was a small hamlet named Alanda. A rich Brāhmaṇ of that village had seven sons by his wife Sārī. One of them only survived. His name was Upatishya alias Sāriputra. He had a friend, named Kolita, of the Mudgala clan ; he was named Maudgalāyana after the name of his clan. They studied together under the same preceptor. Once on a time on mounting the Agrasamāja hill, they fell in with five hundred Yatis resident there. The state of perfect contentment in which they lived, the consideration they enjoyed, the music and dance of their establishment, stimulated the young friends to enter the hermitage. They were admitted into the fraternity by Sanjayī, son of Rāvatī. Upatishya, known in history as Sāriputra, learned all the scriptures relating to asceticism in a week, and his companion did the same in two weeks. By chance they met Upasena, a disciple of Buddha. Upasena was on his usual begging excursion. They asked him in private what sort of lessons did he receive from his preceptor ? Upasena replied that the cardinal doctrine of their faith was that the world is a creation of pratyaya or false notion. The subtle and penetrating intellect of Sāriputra could not fail to perceive the fundamental difference and vast superiority of this doctrine. He resolved to throw himself, a humble student, at the feet of the Lord, and persuaded Maudgalāyana and the five hundred Yatis to adopt the same resolution. The Lord was then living in the same city. In the first conference with the Lord, Sāriputra enquired of him as to who was subject to birth and death, to life and bondage, and what were the causes of these four phenomena ? The Lord replied, “a union of the four substances lead to all these. The causes of birth are ignorance, insatiable desire for enjoyment and work. The causes of death are the loss of longevity, loss of work and want of appetite. The causes of life are longevity, work and form. The cause of bondage is one, viz., work; and work cannot be destroyed until ignorance is dispelled, and thirst after enjoyment is quenched." By lessons and precepts like these, the Lord emancipated Śariputra and others from birth, death and bondage.

The Lord said, this was not the first time that he had saved Sāriputra and five hundred of his companions. In one of his former existences, he was Kesi, a powerful horse who crossed over the sea with five hundred merchants on his back; and thereby saved their lives from the snares of the female ogres of the Rākshashīdvipa. Excepting the incident of the laughing lamp, the present story is substantially the same as that given in the Bhadrakalpāvadāna.

Story of Udāyī, or Kāka Jātaka.—When the fame of Buddha for his sancity spread far and wide, the inhabitants of both sexes of Kapilavasta clamorously demanded that he should be invited from Rājagriha to their city. Śuddhodana, to please them, sent a deputation to invite him. The deputation consisted of Buddha's youthful companion Udāyī, and his favourite groom Chhandaka. They were, on their arrival at Rājagriha, converted to the new faith by the Lord. The Śākya who had been raised to divine rank by their merits, descended from heaven and urged the Lord to bless their relatives by his lectures.

Following the example of Śikhī, an elder Buddha, the Lord undertook the journey to Kapilavastu on foot. Blessed were the lands through which he passed. Health and plenty followed in his train. Nature wore a smiling appearance wherever he presented himself. Barren fields became fertile, and ruined cities rose into sudden prosperity. Celestial music filled the air. Heavenly flowers were showered on the road. Gods smeared the roads with unearthly sandal paste. His journey resembled a royal progress. It took him fifteen days to reach the environs of Kapilavastu. The grove, called Nyagrodhārāma, was fitted out for his reception. He was attended by eighteen hundred Bhikshus. In the morning this whole army of beggars entered the city to collect alms. Rājā Śuddhodana, while on his way to Nyagrodhārāma, happened to fall in with some of these bald-headed, half-starved, emaciated men. He immediately fell into a melancholy vein of thought. "O what a change! What a great misfortune. My imperial son is reduced to the most degraded condition of human life!" These thoughts were too much for him. Tears trickled down his aged cheeks. He ordered his coachman to turn back, and determined never to see his wayward boy. The news of the king's strange conduct reached Nyagrodhārāma in a short time. Udāyī, at the Lord's bidding, passed to the royal presence through the air, showed some miracles, praised Buddha in hymns, convinced the king of his son's great power, and induced him to give up his former resolution.

When the king came to Buddha's residence, Buddha showed him many miracles. Śuddhodana fell on his knees before his son. Buddha delighted him with an affectionate and interesting conversation.

"How was it" asked the Bhikshus "that Śuddhodana was persuaded by Udāyī?" The Lord's reply was that in times of yore there was a king, named Brahmadatta, at Vārāṇasī, and a chief of the crows, named Supātra, was his neighbour. Supārśvā, the wife of the crow-king, was big with child. She longed for princely food. The minister of the crow-king was immediately ordered to supply royal dishes. None of the eighty thousand of the king's subjects volunteered to steal viands from Brahmadatta's kitchen. The minister set himself resolutely to meet the queen's wishes. On the first day he succeeded very easily. On the second day, the men employed in the kitchen spread a net all round the cook-sheds; but the cunning crow snatched a portion of the food from the cook's hand as he was carrying it to the dining-room. The food also was, on the third day, covered with a net. The crow struck at the cook's nose with his beak; but the man dexterously managed to catch hold of him. He complained to the king of the injury done by the wretched crow to his nose. The crow too gave a true history of his mission. The history surprised the king. He admired the zeal and fidelity of the crow, and ordered a portion of the royal food to be set apart for the crow-queen every day. Buddha was the crow-king; Yaśodharā, the queen; Brahmadatta, Śuddhodana; and the minister, Udāyī.

The story of Hastinī Jātaka was told in answer to the query why Mahāprajāvatī was blind with tears in his absence, (vide Bhadrakalpa Avadāna, Story XXXII).

Story of three Asuras.—The Lord trained many thousands of creatures in his faith, by preaching, by precept, and also by working miracles. Rāhula, Muchālinda and Sambara, three royal Asuras, honoured the Lord with flowers and salutations. They were, they said, candidates for the ranks of Arhat. They fell into a deep meditation. The Lord smiled at their over anxiety. Beautiful rays of variegated colours proceeded from his teeth. These turned round him and then disappeared. Aśvaki asked the reason of his smiling, for he knew Buddha never smiled in vain. 'These Asuras' said the Lord, 'are sure to be in heaven. They will descend from that place and worship Jina, and after some hundred thousands of years, become Jinas.'

Story of Yaśodharā's blandishments.—Śuddhodana invited the Lord with his whole congregation, and gave him a splendid treat. He was followed by Gautamī Mahāprajāvatī. Yaśodharā too gave him an entertainment. She approached her long-lost husband in a most bewitching trim. She herself served him with dishes, and displayed all these female arts which delude and enslave the sterner sex. But her empire over the preacher's heart had been lost for ever. She sent some choice sweetmeats through her darling child Rāhula, who asked for his paternal estates. Buddha said that he could give him an immense amount of wealth, if he would only enter the Pravrajyā. Buddha returned to Nyagrodhārāma after delivering a long lecture on virtue.

Why did Yasodharā try to tempt Buddha? In reply to this interesting question, the story of Ekaśringā was by the Lord narrated as related in a preceding page.

Padmāvatī Jātaka follows next (see page 65). And after that Chandra Sūrya Jātaka (see page 69).

Story of Upyaka called Gangāpāla Jātaka.—Śuddhodana issued a proclamation commanding all the Śākya who had more sons than one to send one son each to the hermitage for the service of the Lord. Five hundred Śākya boys left their homes, resolved to enter the pravrajyā. A barber boy, who went to shave the Lord, obtained two Dhyanas from him. The razor was, at the command of the Lord, then taken away from his hand, and he obtained two others. The Śākyas gave all their rich dresses to the barber boy. But the boy, Upāli, was then in a different mood. Disclaiming the rich gifts, he presented himself before the Lord as a candidate for pravrajyā. The Śākyas and Upāli were made to accept pravrajyā on the same day. At the conclusion of the ceremony, the Lord said, that Upāli should be the child of the Śākya Bhikshus. The Śākyas honored Upāli by falling prostrate at his feet.

The Bhikshus thought it strange that the proud Śākyas should bring their heads low before a lowborn barber. "But" said the Lord,

“this is not the first time that they have prostrated themselves before a lowborn man.” He gave the following story in illustration :—

Two poor boys of Benares gave a few beans enclosed in leaf packets to a Pratyeka Buddha. One of them desired to become a Brāhmaṇ in the next existence, and the other a Kshatriya. For that act of charity, they had what they wished. One was born, Brahmadatta, king of Benares ; the other, Upyaka, a Brāhmaṇ. Upyaka lived for a time in intimate terms with a girl with whom he had fallen in love. She desired to have perfumery and flower wreaths. Upyaka proceeded to the banks of the Ganges to get alms wherewith to buy the needful. He got a māsha (a bean). When he was bringing it it slipped from his hand, and was lost. He set to find it out. Brahmadatta, finding a Brāhmaṇ intent on the diligent search of something in the scorching meridian sun, sent for him, and asked him what he was about. On being told of the loss of the māsha the king offered to give him one. “But,” said Upyaka, “that would make two if I could successfully find out my lost bean.” The King offered him a couple of māshas, but still the Brāhmaṇ would not give up his painful search. He only said if he could find his one out, that would certainly add one to all that the king could give. The king at last consented to give him half his possessions, when Upyaka gave up his search. The king sacrificed so much, only because he was disposed to love the Brāhmaṇ. On one occasion, putting his head on the lap of Upyaka, he fell into a sound sleep. Upyaka, who already possessed half the kingdom through the king’s benevolence, now formed a project of obtaining the other half by putting him to death. But his conscience stung him, and he gave up the foul intent. When the king awoke, Upyaka plainly confessed his treasonable purposes, and asked his permission to renounce the world, saying, that ambition can never be satisfied. On the departure of Upyaka, the king composed a verse in which he denounced ambition, and quoted Upyaka’s conduct in illustration. Gaṅgāpāla, the king’s barber, hearing the gāthā, went over to Upyaka and became a Bhikshu. He soon attained the five experiences. [Pañchābhijñā.]

The success and good fortune of Gaṅgāpāla induced the king to throw himself with his whole court at Upyaka’s feet. This Gaṅgāpāla was Upyāka, and the Śākyas were Brahmadatta’s followers.

Story of Mahāgovinda.—The Bhikshus asked the Lord why so many renounced the world when the Lord himself entered the hermitage ? The Lord gave them a legend of Vipasyī. Pañchaśikha, the son of a heavenly chorister, illuminating the four quarters of the globe with the lustre of his brilliant person, descended to where the Lord was, and begged him to explain the legend of Mahābrahmā. The Lord said, king Diśāmpati had a son named Reṇu. His family-priest had a son named Jyotihpāla who, having silenced all his opponents in a controversy, obtained the title of Mahāgovinda. By the instigation of Mahāgovinda six noble Kshatriyas demanded from Reṇu a share of his father's territories. Reṇu was compelled to dismember his father's empire, and cede the six provinces of Kalinga, Paṭṭana, Māheśavatī, Vārāṇasī, Rōruka, and Mithilā to the refractory nobles.

Successful in their ambitious projects, the nobles proceeded to Mahāgovinda to ask him what to do next. Govinda turned his face to the north, and fell into a deep meditation. Mahābrahmā appeared before him in the fulness of his glory, and stood over his head. The saintly priest, awed by the divine presence, chanted solemn hymns, and offered flowers and incense. The boon that he prayed to obtain was instruction how to obtain immortality and perfect beatitude. The great truth was revealed. Mahābrahmā uttered the following words and disappeared :

“Have affection for none ; be merciful to all ; seek solitude ; discriminate truth from falsehood ; have no āmagandha (raw smell) ; forsake the company of women ; and you will obtain immortality.” The āmagandhas are ; anger, untruth, talkativeness, egotism, envy, cruelty, speaking ill of others, and wrath.

Mahāgovinda, having the great truth revealed to him, continued no longer in the wicked course of the world, but with Renu, the six Kshatriya chiefs, and thousands of others, entered the blissful state of Pravrajyā. Buddha was that Mahāgovinda.

Story of Bahubuddha.—The Lord said to Ānanda there lived in a certain Kalpa, Indradhvaja, a Tathāgata and Arhat, in the beautiful city of Indratapana. He explained the Mahā Buddha to Mahādhvaja ; Mahādhvaja did so to Dhvajottama, Dhvajottama to Dhvajaruchira, and so on, till it was imparted to Bahubuddha. Then come some verses in praise of Samyak Samādhi.

Rāhula's conversion.—Śuddhodana requested the Lord to take his meal at his palace as long as he would be at Kapilavastu. The lord was silent. Rāhula obtained the five lessons from his father, and renounced the world in spite of his mother's remonstrances. The five lessons are these : (1) “I take refuge with Buddha, I take refuge with Dharma, I take refuge with Saṅgha ; Buddha is my only protector ; I have none else to look after me ; Dharma is my only protector, I have none ; else to look after me. Saṅgha in my only protector, I have none else to look after me. (2) I solemnly take a vow of seclusion for life. (3) I will not take anything not given [to] me. (4) I will never tread the paths of a wrong-doer. (5) I will never tell an untruth. I will fly away from the haunts of pleasure."

Story of Dharmalabdha.—When the wicked Māra, discomfited and put to route by the Lord, was lamenting over his sad lot, his daughters, Tantrā, Rati and others, tried their wily arts to reduce the great ascetic from the path of virtue. But they too shared their father's fate. After this, the Lord set the wheel of his religion in motion, and became the great founder of a new creed. The Bhikshus, always bent on enquiring after the causes of their Lord's actions, asked him the reason of the discomfiture of the daughters of Māra. They were told that there was in the city of Benares a good man named Dharmalabdha, who grew rich by enterprising voyages by sea. A company of five hundred enterprising youths waited in a deputation on him to request him to show them the way to wealth. He received them graciously, but at the same time gave them fully to understand the dangers and difficulties of sea voyages. He told them that he traded with the people of the Rākshasīdvīpa. The Rākshasīs of the place were adepts in all sorts of fascinations. Unless one was confident of rising superior to their temptation, it was not safe to transact business with them. One who fell into their snare had no hope of seeing the Jambudvīpa any more. But still these worshippers of mammon persisted. Dharmalabdha set sail with these five hundred merchants in his company, and a few men-of-war to protect them. But the five hundred young men, unable to resist the temptation of sensual enjoyment placed before them by the Rākshasīs, fell into their snare, and were lost. In a few days after their landing at the cannibal island the gross and material part of their body formed delicious dishes for the delectation of the female ogres. Dharmalabdha alone came back, laden with riches. Repeatedly baffled in their attempt to tempt Dharmalabdha, the wicked gang of demons held a solemn council. It was determined at that meeting that one of their number should go to tempt and ruin the innocent man. The chief of the mischievous crew—an incarnation of deception—undertook to proceed to Benares. Concealed in the form of a celestial damsel, and accompanied by an amiable and handsome child, she presented herself at the door of Dharmalabdha, demanding admission into his seraglio as his married wife. She was denied access by that firm and experienced merchant. But Brahmadata, the king of Benares, ignorant of her wiles and impelled by a chivalric feeling, not only gave her protection, but took her as his wife. At the dead of night the Rākshasī left the royal bed, made a feast of the king, and then gorged her appetite with all that fell in her way. She did not even spare the elephants. Anarchy prevailed over the whole country. Next morning, at a great council, Dharmalabdha was elected king. The Rākshasis were the daughters of Māra, and Dharmalabdha was the Lord himself.*

Story of a Goatherd.—When the Lord was practising austerities at Nairāñjanā in the burning heat of the meridian sun, a goatherd planted a pipal tree by his side to relieve him. In a short time it grew into a gigantic size, overshadowing an extensive tract of land. The goatherd saw with delight the sudden growth of his tree. For the cheerfulness of his heart, the source of all human bliss, the goatherd was, after his death, translated to the region of the gods of the class thirty-three. He came down from that high position to dedicate the tree to the Lord, who with silence accepted the offering.

Story of the Lord's Progress from Uruvilvā.—From Nairāñjanā the Lord went to Kshīrikā, and thence proceeded to a small hamlet named Ujjvala. There he remained for 49 days without touching human food. On the fiftieth day a small quantity of ghi and honey was offered to him by a merchant named Trapushabhallika.† The Lord gave a few of his hairs, the pairings of his nails, and a few pieces of stones brought from a great distance by his miraculous power, to the merchant and his companions. The merchant established a stupa over these nails at a place named Bāluka, over the hairs at Keshas-thali, and over the stones at Śilu. Indra gave the Lord a myrobalan. After eating the kernel, the Lord threw the stone on the ground. Instantly from that stone grew forth a tree of gigantic dimensions. This is the first time that the Lord's Riddhi or miraculous power was displayed. Then for six long years the Lord practised severe penances at Uruvilvā. At this time a pious man brought a Śonapaṇshukula‡ before the Lord, and offered it to him on the express condition that he should not eat it until he brought his austerities to a successful termination. The offerer was translated to the region of the thirty-three gods. When the lord wanted to partake of the fruit, he needed water to wash his hands and feet. Indra excavated a river with his nails. The river is still called Pāṇikhātā. When the lord wanted a vessel to wash the fruit, four great celestial kings offered him four stone vases. In one he washed the Śoṇapāṇśhukula; in the second he purified it; the third he miraculously threw at Trapushbhallika's dwelling in the Gāndhāra country. In the fourth he ate. These four stone vases were afterwards consecrated by men. The Lord then bathed in the stream of Pāṇikhātā. He then wished to cross it. The Devaputra Kakubha, who lived in a large shady tree named Kakubha, ferried him over to the other side of the river. There he sat under the pipal tree planted by the goatherd. There for the first time did the thought of preaching the true religion cross his mind. He should not, he thought, keep to himself, the truth, so subtle, so brilliant, so grand, and calculated to improve the condition of mankind so greatly. Mahābrahmā and other gods at the same time came down from the regions celestial, to confirm him in his resolution. He felt in him a strength produced by previous meditation and by an irreproachable character. He thought there were only five men of respectable antecedents who may receive the doctrine to be preached by him. They were at Benares. He directed his steps, accordingly, towards that holy city. His route lay through Gayā, Nāhāl, Bundadvira, Lohitavastuka, Cardiapura and Sārathipura. The last place was situated on the banks of the Ganges. In the form of a goose the Lord flew over the river, and reached the deer park at Vārāṇasī. On his way from Gayā to Vārāṇasī, he was entertained by Sudarśana and Kamaṇḍalu, two Nāgarājas, and Gaudha and Bundha, two Yakshas. He had much talk with Nadi and Upaka. In these conversations he declared in unmistakable terms his own prophetship, and spoke in high terms of his great mission on earth. He claimed honors, superior to those of Brahmachāris, Jinas and Arhats, and gave out that he derived every doctrine of his creed by inspiration.*

At Benares, the five youths of respectable antecedents, who were his first companions, were converted. They became Bhikshus. There were, they were told, two ends which a Bhikshu should always keep in view. There should be no ignorant hankering after external enjoyments which were mere delusions, and also there should be no blind faith in the existence of a soul as the source of suffering and distress. To attain these two ends it is necessary to meditate on the four Āryasatyas or 'noble truths.' These were that there were suffering, combination of sufferings, an annihilation of suffering, and a Pratipat or belief which leads to the end of all sufferings. Union with enemies and separation from friends &c., are sufferings. Social instincts, ambition, love, &c., are the combinations of different sufferings. The annihilation of these feelings constitutes the annihilation of suffering. The belief or Pratipat has eight subordinate parts : 1, true insight, 2, true resolve, 3, true speech, 4, true end of Karma, 5, pure living, 6, true exercise, 7, true recollection, and 8, true meditations. The sufferings and their combinations are to be shunned by all possible means, while their annihilation is to be sought with eagerness. These noble truths were twelve times thought over and mastered by the Lord.

External qualities, feelings of consciousness, beliefs and impressions—Are these Ātmā ? The external qualities are not Ātmā, for they produce misery, and do not tend towards the attainments of the highest bliss, the goal of human desires. For the same considerations neither feeling, nor consciousness, nor the others can be regarded as Ātmā. Candidates for Pravrajyā should learn very carefully that the external qualities, feelings, consciousness, beliefs or impressions, either external or internal, subtle or gross, good or bad, past, present or future—these are neither one's own self, nor are belonging to him. Misery and melancholy have their root in these, therefore men should try to dis-dain them. They are transitory, subject to birth and death, therefore the sooner these are discarded the better it is for the hermit.

Story of Ajñātakaunḍilya.—Ajñātakaunḍilya thought over these noble truths for three times, and his eyes were opened. He was in one of his former existences a potter who cured a Pratyeka Buddha from a bilious disorder, and obtained from him the boon that he should be the first man to receive the religion of Sugata.

Ajñātakaunḍilya was, in another existence, a merchant relieved by the amiable and virtuous king of Kośala, who, to avoid bloodshed in a war with the king of Kāśī, had abdicated his kingdom, and gone into a voluntary exile. While roaming in the Dakṣiṇāpātha, he happened to see a shipwrecked merchant who was on his way to the king of Kośala, on whose munificence he counted for repairing his fallen fortunes. Little did the poor man know that he was addressing the very king of Kośala whose fortunes were now no better than his own. The king instantly disabused him, gave him an account of his own misfortunes, and expressed his sorrow that he could no longer be useful to a man in distress. The poor merchant, disappointed at the last resort which hope had pointed out to him, fell into a swoon, and remained insensible for a long time.

But a glimpse of hope now shot through the heart of the good king. He remembered that a price had been set on his head ; so he persuaded the distressed gentleman, now recovering from the effect of the swoon, to take him alive to the king of Benares. This spirit of self-sacrifice surprised the king of Kāśī, who now repented of what he had done, and not only gave the merchant a large sum of money, but reinstated the king on his throne.

Story of Five Disciples. Bhadravargiya Jātaka.—The Bhikshus enquired how it was that the five men of respectable antecedents, who were the followers of Tirthikas, and were therefore ill-disposed to the Lord's creed, were so easily converted? It was an indication of very great sagacity in the Lord that he made them his staunchest adherents first of all. In one of their previous existences they were cast into the sea together with the Lord who was the captain of the merchantman. They were all floating on the raging surge without the faintest hope of being wafted to firm land. On a sudden they found the captain whom they all implored to save them. Equally distressed with the rest, the captain happened to remember an old saying, that the sea never drowns a corpse. He instantly commanded them to lay fast hold of him, which they did. He drew out a knife and plunged it in his breast. With his dead body they all were thrown upon the shore.

Stories of wicked kings.—There was, once on a time, a king named Kālabha, reigning at Benares. Walking about in his pleasure-garden in the company of the ladies of his zenana, he fell into a profound sleep under a tree. In the meanwhile a Rishi from the Uttarakuru came to the garden, and began to deliver a lecture to the ladies. The king, when he left his bed, was greatly enraged at the conduct of the uncouth stranger who had violated the sanctity of his female quarters. He asked the Rishi who he was. The Rishi declared himself to be a Kshāntivādī, one who pardons all injuries, whereupon the king drew his sword and cut off one of the Rishi's fingers. The Rishi remained unmoved ; the king cut a second finger ; and then a third. Gradually his body was cut to pieces ; but he could not be made to show any signs of distress. Milk only issued forth from the wounds and no blood. The Rishi was Buddha in a former life.

King Arjuna of Hastināpura was in the habit of killing those holy men who were unable to satisfy him by answers to the questions put to them by him. He put to death Gautama, a most amiable old Rishi, only for failing to answer one of his questions.

Nālikela was the king of Dantapura in Kalinga, who offered to some Rishis for their repast, a basketful of wild thorny berries called śvana-kha (Flacourtea cotaphracta), and forbade them to laugh on path of death.

Daṇḍaki was another of the wicked kings. He reigned at Gobardhana in the Dakṣiṇāpatha. Vatsa, a disciple of Kāśyapa, who came for a change from the Himālayan regions (for he was suffering from consumption) to Daṇḍaki's city, was buried under a heap of dust by that wicked monarch. He was, however, rescued by a virtuous minister of the king. On the seventh day after his rescue Vatsa died, and immediately after his death, there was a great conflagration which converted the whole city into a heap of ruins. The king perished with all his wicked followers, the rescuer of Vatsa, alone escaping for the timely information afforded to him by the Rishi.

Another disciple of Kāśyapa, Sarabhangā by name, obtained great merit by his austerities and his prowess. He was present at a great sacrifice held at a place between the Ganges and the Yamunā. Ninety-eight thousand of Rishis, three kings of Hastinā and Dantapura (viz. Udyaka, Aṣṭamaka, Bhinsaratha), and Indra, along with many gods, honored the sacrifice by their presence. Before this assembled multitude of gods and men Sarabhangā revealed the terrible fate that had befallen these four wicked kings who dishonored the venerable sages. Daṇḍakī, he said, was hurled headlong into the abyss of a hell named Kukura; Arjuna, with head downwards, was placed upon the stake, Nālikela lived on all that was loathsome; and Kālabha was drowned in the hell Abīchi.

Buddha in one of his previous existences was Svarabhangā, therefore he preached to all.

Notable conversions.—During his short sojourn in the Mrigadāva, the great preacher converted 30 kings and Pūrṇa, a young Brāhman of Droṇavastu in the Kośala country. On his way from Uruvilvā he also converted 700 Rishis with matted hairs.

When he was at Uruvilvā, Rājā Vimbisāra desired to see him, and instantly heard of the saint's sudden appearance in the Shashṭivana of his own capital Rājagriha. The Lord preached the truth to him, and showed him the way to Nirvāṇa. The reason of showing this extraordinary favour to the king was, that in one of his previous existences he was the Lord's playmate. His name then was Arindama, and that of the Lord Śreṇya. He was king while Śreṇya was a hermit. In that existence too the Lord, after 84,000 years of separation, had remembered his old friend, and brought him to a hermit's life.

MAÑICHŪḌA AVADĀNA.

Story of Mañichūḍa, a pious king of Suketa, who had given his own body to a demon. It was related by the Lord himself when dwelling in the Jeta Grov. of Śrāvastī. The lord having exhibited some miracles, the audience greatly wondered, and enquired how he had acquired the power of working miracles. Thereupon he narrated many stories of miracles effected in his former existences, and then said : Brahmadatta, king of Suketa, had a son born unto him, who had on his head at the time of birth a crown more refulgent than the sun, and drops of moisture falling from it converted a mass of iron into gold. On account of these miraculous events the child was named Mañichūḍa, alias Ratnachūḍa. When Mañichūḍa succeeded his father, he caused many alms-houses to be established, and ruled the country with great energy and justice. He had an elephant named Bhadragrīvī and a horse named Ājūneya, each of which could travel, 400 miles a day. At the time there lived, in a cave in the Himālaya, a sage named Bhavabhūti. The sage once found a beautiful damsel seated on a lotus in a tank. He named her Padmāvati, and brought her up in his hermitage. When she was grown up, he made her over to Mañichūḍa, who married her, and had by her a son named Padmottara. The king once celebrated the great rite of Nigada Mahāyajña, and in course of it was asked by a fierce demon to give him some human blood for food. Rather than disappoint a beggar on such an occasion, and at the same time unwilling to shed human blood, he ripped open his own neck, and gave the blood flowing therefrom. The demon next asked for some meat, and the king gave his own body. Greatly pleased by the extraordinary munificence, the demon, who was no other than Indra in that shape, assumed his own shape, and offered him universal sovereignty, long life, or whatever else he wanted. Mañichūḍa wished to be a Buddha, so that he may be able to effect the salvation of mankind. The boon was granted. On the conclusion of the rite, the king gave away to the Brāhmanys by way of alms his precious horse and elephant, as well as his wife and son. A neighbouring king, named Dusprasava, demanded the elephant, and threatened war unless his request was complied with. Rather than fight and bring on carnage, the king bought back the elephant, and gave it to Dusprasava. At this moment four Pratyeka Buddhas seized Mañichūḍa, and carried him away to the top of the Himālaya, where they left him. The minister of Mañichūḍa ransomed the prince, and placed him on the throne. The queen was ransomed, and brought back home, and the Dusprasava was overpowered in battle. Thereupon Dusprasava sent five Brāhmaṇs to buy of Mañichūḍa the crown which was on his head. The king immediately split open his head, and gave the jewel ; but by a miracle his head was reunited, and a new jewel of even great magnificence sprung on it. "This Mañichūḍa" said the Lord, "was myself in a former birth, and on account of my munificence I am now able to work miracles." Asked what had Mañichūḍa done to attain the jewel, the Lord said, in a preceding birth Mañichūḍa was the son of Aruṇa, a king who had erected a jewelled stūpa on the remains of Buddha Śikhī, and the son had placed on it his own crown, and decorated it with a jewelled parasol.

A charm for warding off evils likely to result from adverse planets, ferocious animals, and venomous insects.

It is said that on one occasion when Buddha was sojourning on the bank of a tank near a cremation ground at Rājagriha, his son Rāhula appeared before him, and complained of the sufferings to which he was subjected by adverse planets, ferocious animals, venomous insects, and diseases, and prayed for relief. Thereupon the Lord imparted to him a charm which, when heard, or recited, or borne on the person as an amulet, was calculated to keep such evils a hundred thousand miles away from one so protected. The charm begins with the words "angā kalingā bhangā varangā sansāra-tarangā," &c. This work, along with four others, viz., Mahā-ptatisarā, Mahā-sahasra-pramardinī, Mahāmāyūrī, and Mahā-rakshā-mantrānusārīṇī, bears the common name of Pancharakshā, or the "five protectors."

The first page of each of the five works has on its middle a vignette; that on the Mahā-śitavatī, represents a green-coloured goddess with three heads and six hands, seated on two Garuḍas. Of the heads one is yellow, one red, and one of the colour of the body.

A charm for keeping off diseases. It was imparted by the Lord when he was dwelling in that Bamboo grove near the town of Vaiśālī.
Ānanda, who was in his company, was directed to go and recite it in the city of Vaiśālī, and it brought untold blessings on that city. The charm begins with the words, visarata (5 times repeated) Buddha lokānukampaka ājñāpayati, sarvabuddhānumatinā sarva-pratyeka-buddhānumatinā” &c.

The goddess represented in this codex is four-headed and ten-handed, and seated on two peacocks. The colour of the goddess is red, but her heads are successively white, red, blue and yellow.

A collection of mantras and rituals for overcoming the evils which wicked spirits cause to mankind.

The work opens, in common with the other four works with which it is associated, in the usual style of the Mahāyāna Sūtras, with the words "thus has it been heard by me," and claims to be a work of that class. It is said that when the Lord was dwelling in the grove of Prabhāsavana, on the Gṛidhrakūṭa hill, in Rājagriha, in the company of thirteen hundred and fifty followers, he perceived, by his transcendental knowledge, that the town of Vaiśālī was then under great tribulation. Earthquakes, cyclones, prolonged cloudiness emerging everything into impermiable gloom, and the evil eyes of Saturn were rendering everything desolate there. At this juncture all the principal gods, headed by Brahmā and Indra, appeared before the Lord, and prayed that the knowledge of the Mahā-sāhasra-pramardinī mantra may be revealed to them. Thereupon the Lord enquired what mantras they knew to overcome supernatural evils? The great king Vaiśravaṇa said, "when men are afflicted by Yakshas, they laugh, run about, talk wildly, get angry, tremble, knock about, &c., and for it this is my mantra." The words of the mantra are siddhe susiddhe sattve ave araṇe bale tambhe stambhe jaṭile akhane sukhane khakhane kharate kharange halipingale timingale timingilini mangale siddhyantu mantra padā svāhā, mama saparivārasya sattvānāncha svastyastu, vaiśravaṇasya mahārājasya nāmnā balenāiśvaryaādhipatyena cha svāhā. It means "may such and such (evils, naming them) be overcome by the name, might, majesty and supremacy of the great king Vaiśravaṇa." Similarly the great king Dhṛitarāshṭra gave his mantra for overcoming Gandharvas, the great king Virudhaka his charm for overcoming Kusmāṇḍa Preta, and the great king Virūpāksha his charm for overcoming Nāgagṛīhas. Thereupon the Lord, with the voice of a lion, declared before the audience : "I am possessed of the ten great powers ; I possess the four great secrets. By me alone was Māra overcome with his mighty army." He then recited the great mantra, "the secret for overcoming endless thousands of evils" :—Mahāsāhasra-pramardinī-sandhi. It runs thus : asanga-khaḍgavate balaṇirghoshe sūre sūravate vajrasame vajrāgame vajradhare sushṭhe jambhe dṛiḍhasaravraje vighare vairāgra-prāpte araṇe araṇodharmayukte diśi vighuṣṭhe svāhā, svastyastu mama sarvasattvānāncha tathāgatasya nāmnā balenāiśvarjādhipatehścha svāhā.

On hearing this all the wicked spirits of the earth dispersed far and wide ; and the lord appointed some of the leading gods guardians of the different quarters of the universe, each of the guardians undertaking to keep the peace by an appropriate mantra which he recited. After this the Lord, out of mercy for the Lichchhavis of Vaiśālī repaired to them, and blessed them, removing all their troubles by the great mantra which he had recited.

The remainder of the work describes the different symptoms which manifest themselves when a person is afflicted by particular wicked spirits, and the rituals which should be observed when the great mantra is to be recited, or worn on the person ; the details varying under different circumstances. The Rev. S. Beal, in his Buddhist Tripitaka, notices a Chinese work named Sheou-hu-ta-tsien-kwo-t'u-king or the Mahāsāhasra Maṇḍala Sūtra, which, I believe, is the same with the work here described. It was translated by Shi-hu during the Sung dynasty (Circa 960 to 1278), and is said to contain Dharaṇīs.

The vignette in this case represents a fierce goddess with exposed teeth and blue colour, seated on two crouching men of a yellow colour. The heads are successively white, blue, red and yellow.

MAHĀ-PRATISARĀ-KALPA.

Substance, Nepalese paper, $12\frac{1}{2} \times 3\frac{1}{2}$ inches. Folia, 1 to 42. Lines on a page, 5. Extent in ślokas, 588. Character, Newāri. Date, 944, Newāri. Appearance, old. Incorrect.

A charm for destroying sin, disease, and all difficulties.

It was revealed by the Lord when he was dwelling under a kalpa tree near a tank on the crest of the Mahāvajra Meru mountain. It runs thus : Om vipula-garbhe vipula-vimale vimala-garbhe vipula-vimala-vimala-garbhe vimale jaya-garbhe vajra-jvāna-garbhe gatigahane gagana-viśodhane sarva-pāpa-viśodhane. Om guṇavati gagana-vihariṇi gagana-viharini gagariṇi gagariṇi giriṇi giriṇi gubhari gardhabhari gamari gahari gaha gaha gargari gargari gagari gagari gabhari gabhari gabhi gabhi gahi gahi gamani gamani gara gara guha guha guru guru guruvichale muchale sumuchale svāhā. The meaning of most of these words is unintelligible, but the sentences formed by them are said to be most effectual in overcoming evils of every kind. In illustration of their supreme power, several stories are recited. In one case a person, bitten by a cobra, was saved from impending death by reciting it. Brahmadata, after bathing in the Ganges, put the charm on his head, and thereby overcame a powerful king with whom he was engaged in war. A Brāhmaṇ, suffering from leprosy, put it on his neck and was immediately cured. On his death he was carried away by the messengers of Yama to the dreadful hell called Abichi. On his appearance there all the instruments of torture lost their power, and the dwellers of hell were restored to felicity. Yama was thereupon obliged to remove him from this place of confinement. A ship was once assailed by sea-monsters, fearful storms, thunder and lightning, and was on the point of being engulfed into the sea, when one of the passengers wrote the mantra on a piece of paper, and stuck the paper on the top of the mast. Thereupon all commotions subsided, and the ship safely reached its destination. A malefactor was sent to the place of execution ; he put the charm on his head, and the instruments of the executioners could no longer hurt him ; and he was allowed to go away. After these illustrations come the rituals for consecrating the charm for putting it on, and then the praises thereof. The name of this work does not occur in the Rev. S. Beal's Catalogue of the Chinese Tripitaka.

The vignette on the first page of this codex represents a goddess with four heads and eight hands, and seated on two lions. The body of the goddess and that of the lion are white, but the heads of the goddess are successively green, white, red, and yellow.

A commentary on a work called Vinaya Sūtra. By Chandrakīrti Āchārya. The text is not forthcoming, nor has it been noticed by M. Burnouf, nor in the Chinese Tripitaka ; but initial words and sometimes entire stanzas occur in the commentary. Though the name of the text is Vinaya or "discipline," to judge from the commentary, the work is throughout metaphysical, and describes the rationale or philosophy of mental phenomena. The commentary is divided, probably in accordance with the text, into 27 chapters. Contents : 1. On cognition of external objects. II. Perception of motion. III. The nature of the organs of sense. IV. Shape and colour. V. Animated beings. VI. Attraction and the attracted. VII. Consciousness. VIII. Cause of consciousness. IX. Conditions precedent of consciousness. X. Relation between cause and effect, or of fire and fuel. XI. Existence, or of those who suffer birth, pain, pleasure and death. XII. Pain, what is it ? XIII. Residual impression. XIV. Relation between agents, organs and objects, as the seer, the seeing and the object seen ; the hearer, the hearing and the object heard, &c. XV. Nature of disposition. XVI. The free and the bound. XVII. Deserts, their cause and effect. XVIII. Enquiry into what is self. XIX. Times past, present and future, their relations. XX. Subsidiary causes of fruition. XXI. Thought, its origin and cessation. XXII. Existence of Tathāgata. XXIII. Origin of love, enmity and delusion in relation to good and evil. XXIV. Āryasatya or affliction. XXV. Final emancipation. XXVI. Five instruments of knowledge, consciousness. XXVII. Right and wrong consciousness.

The author of the work is a Śūnyavādī or Nihilist, who does not admit the material existence of anything, and the object of the work is to prove that nothing exists. The way in which he works out his theory will be illustrated by the following extract. The subject being vision, an antagonist is supposed to remark : (Text) "vision, audition, smell, taste, touch and mind are the organs, and the objects of these six are what are to be seen &c." (Commentary) "Hence it follows that vision &c., are natural powers. But vision cannot be a power. If you say to see is vision and it is the eye, and colour may be described as its object." (It is not so.) (Text) "The eye does not perceive the truth of its own self ; and how can that which cannot see its ownself perceive others?" (Commentary) "Thus the eye does not see its own self, for to do so would be an impossible function. (If you say) Though the eye does not perceive itself, still it beholds others like fire, i.e., even as fire burns the substance of others and yet not its own, so the eye sees others though not itself ; it would not be consistent." (Text) "Because the example of fire is insufficient to establish vision." (Commentary) "The example of fire which you have adduced is not 'sufficient' i.e., it is not apposite and not applicable, because" (Text) "the eye-possessing (is applicable to) what has been said about going, gone, and not-gone." (Commentary) "That which exists with an eye is eye-possessing. The example of fire which you have adduced to establish the eye, has been condemned along with the possessor of the eye. How so ? By the words 'going, gone and not gone.' Thus, that which is gone cannot go, the not-going cannot go, nor can the going go, and so the fire does not burn the burnt, nor does it burn the unburnt, and these are parallel passages. Thus, as the gone, the not-gone or the going, does not go, so the seen does not see, nor the un-seen see, and the seeing, which is neither seen nor not-seen, does not see. This is what is said. Even as the gone does not go, so, it is said, the burnt does not burn, and this is what is meant. And since the example of the fire is condemned by the example of going, gone and not-gone, the example of fire cannot be of avail to establish the position about the eye ; and hence the conclusion is that the eye does not see others as it does not see itself."

A collection of mantras for neutralising the effect of snake-poison.

When the Lord was in the Jeta grove at Śrāvastī, Ānanda reported that a Bhikshu had been bitten by a black serpent, and was on the point of dying, and thereupon the Lord revealed the mantras. They are all of the same character, full of repetitions, and unintelligible words. One of them runs thus :—Idi viḍi kiḍi hiḍi piḍini mede do deinbā āde ūāde ghaḍe durghaḍe hiriṇi chatudi hurivegāḍi vegāḍi paśupisāchini aponiṇi svāhā.—Another begins with the word hu repeated 36 times, then putu 9 times, then, nāgaleleke &c. The mantras are said to have been originally known to a king of peacocks who dwelt on the southern scarp of the Himālaya, and thence their name 'Māyūri' or relating to a peacock. Peacocks are well-known to destroy small snakes, but I have never heard of their attacking cobras. In the Rev. Mr. Beal's Catalogue of the Chinese Tripiṭhaka, this work occurs under two names, viz., Fo-mon-ta-kong tsio-ming-wong king, and Suk-tung-Fo-muk-to-kon-tsio-ming-wang-king, with the Sanskrit name 'Mahā Māyūri-vidyā-rāḍjñi-dhārāṇi.'

A charm for self-preservation. It was imparted when the Lord was at the Jeta grove in Śrāvastī. In the course of one of his lectures he said, "There is a goddess who travels before the sun and the moon ; she is invisible, indestructible, incomprehensible, intractible, unblamable, and unassailable by weapons. Her name is Mārichī (darkness-destroyer). Whoever hears her name becomes possessed of her qualities, and this is her mantra." The mantra begins with the words.—"Om prākramasi, prākramasi, udayamasi, vairamasi," &c. The Chinese version of this work bears the name of Fo-shwo-Ma-li-chi-tica-to-ḷo-li-catan-king, which means 'Buddha recites the Dhāraṇī of Mārichī Devī, and extends to two pages. In this work we find an attempt made to render Ushā or the Dawn of the Hindus subservient to Buddhist worship.

A hymn in praise of Buddha, each letter of the alphabet forming a distinct epithet, and implying an attribute of the sage. It is said to have been imparted by Buddha himself at the request of certain Bodhisattvas headed by Vajradhara. This style of stringing together epithets to form names is common both to the Hindus and the Buddhists, and is not unknown to the Arabs, who have similar works.
One of their works is named the "Handsome names of God."

Annexed to the codex there are eight other hymns ; (1) to Mañjuśrī, in eight stanzas ; (2) to Vāgiśvara ; (3) to Buddha as Daśabala ;
(4) to Avalokiteśvara by Chandrakāntā, a Bhikṣuṇī ; (5) to Śākya by Yaśodharā ; (6) in praise of the personal beauty of Avalokiteśvara ;
(7) to Avalokiteśvara, by Charapati ; and (8) in praise of Saṅgha.

The generic name Prajñā-pāramitā or "transcendental knowledge" includes five different works. The first of which is said to comprise matter sufficient to make up one hundred and twenty-five thousand octosyllabic verses. The second contains one hundred thousand similar verses; the third, twenty-five thousand verses; the fourth, ten thousand verses; and the fifth, eight thousand verses. Of these, the Asiatic Society's Library contains the 2nd, the 3rd, and the 5th. All these are in prose, and, roughly speaking, the extents traditionally assigned to them are nearly correct. The work under notice is the second; it is generally known under the name of Śatasāhasrikā, or the recension of a hundred thousand verses. By my calculations of 132 letters to the śloka, the actual extent is 113,677 ślokas. The specific name of the work is Rakṣhā bhagavatī. It comprises 72 chapters or Parivartas, divided into four parts or khaṇḍas. It is pre-eminently a work of the Mahāyāna class, and its main topic is the doctrine of Śūnyavāda or the evolution of the universe from vacuity or nihility. This topic is developed in the form of discourses in which Buddha himself is the chief expounder; but some of his principle disciples also appear as teachers. In the course of the discussions, all topics of metaphysics which had engaged the attention of the Buddhists and the Hindus are expounded at length, adverse systems are refuted, and everything is made to accord with the doctrine of nihility. The system of Hīnayāna is especially noticed, and refuted repeatedly. True Buddhism is declared to be founded on the theory of nihility, and the attainment of the highest perfection is made to depend on the performance of meditations of which the object should be śūnyatā or nihility. The meditations enjoined are the same which are described in the Sāṅkhya Sūtra of Kapila, and in the Yoga Sūtra of Patañjali, and most of the technical terms used are evidently borrowed from the Hindu systems. All the duties enjoined in the Vinaya are repeatedly advocated, and their philosophical bearing to the vacuous doctrine is expounded. With so unreal an ultimatum, the force and persistency with which are enjoined the duties of benevolence, charity, good conduct and abstinence from evil, each called a pāramitā, are remarkable.

The work opens with the description of a scene on the Grīdhra-kūṭa hill, near Rājagṛīha, where the Lord performed a Samādhi, whereupon flames issued forth from his body, and illumined the ten quarters of the globe. He then opened wide his mouth, wherein were seen thousands of thousand petalled golden lotuses, amidst which his image was seen seated. The light from his body relieved mankind from all pains and troubles. The dwellers in hell were ransomed; the deaf regained their power of hearing; the blind were restored to sight. Gods and aerial spirits all came to the place to worship the sage. Thereupon a Bodhisattva, named Samantaraśmi, asked the cause of this light. This led to the sage's imparting to his audience the Prajñā-pāramitā. The different pāramitās were then successively expounded; these include the hundred and eight pāramitās noticed in chapter IV of the Lalita Vistara and a great many others; the advantages of following these pāramitās are also detailed. The subject of vacuity or nothingness, śūnyatā, is next expounded. Then follow instructions on five kinds of instruction (śikṣhā), eight kinds of disposition of the body (aṅgaramattva), four kinds of meditation (dhyāna), four kinds of proofs (prāmāṇa), four kinds of bodilessness (arūpyasamāipatti), five kinds of consciousness (abhiññā), six kinds of memory (anusmṛiti), which result from a knowledge of the true import of vacuity. Varieties of vacuity. Contrarities. Exercise of six of the pāramitās. Purification of the senses.

Chapter II. The second chapter is devoted to the exposition of the true character of the soul (ātmā), and its relation to form, colour and other qualities, and to vacuity (śūnyatā).

Chapter III. Chapter third treats of the necessity of Bodhisattvas abstaining from passion, envy and other mental perturbations, and the relation of those perturbations to calm contemplation of the truth, and to vacuity.

Chapter IV. Relation of form to reality, and the propriety of ascertaining its bearing to vacuity.

Chapter V. The ascertainment of the notion of greatness, agitation, pain, pleasure, dispassion &c. through knowledge. Various forms of Samādhi calculated to afford that knowledge.

Chapter VI. All qualities are illusive (māyāmaya). How they are to be overcome. Yoga is pointed out as the means for it. The influence of Mārasatan in frustrating the fruits of Yoga, how to be controlled.

Chapter VII. Bodhisattva defined, his supernatural powers how derived? Humanity and its characteristics; how they are to be overcome by a Bodhisattva ? Purport of various epithets used to indicate a Bodhisattva. How a Bodhisattva merges all natural attributes into vacuity ? The six pāramitās.

Chapter VIII. Characteristics of various kinds of Samādhi, such as Suraṅgamā, Ratnamudrā, Sīṅhavikṛīḍitā, Suchandrā, Chandradhvajā, Sarva-dharmasaṅgatā, Vilokitamūrdhā, Dharmadhātu-niyatā, Niyata-dhvajaketu, Sarvadharmā-praveśa-mudrā, Samādhirājasupratishṭhitā, Rāsmipramuktā, Čalavyūha-samudgatā, &c.

Chapter IX. Definitions and expositions of the Bodhisattva attributes noticed in chapter I, viz., 4 Samyak-prahānas ; 4 Riddhipādas ; 5 Indriyas ; 5 Balas ; 7 Sambaudhyaṅgas ; 8 Aṅgamārgas ; 3 Samādhis ; 11 Jñānas, or perceptions ; 3 Indriyas ; 10 Anusmṛitis ; 4 Dhyānas ; 3 Pramāṇas ; 4 Arūpya-samāpatti ; 10 Tathāgata-bala ; 4 Vaiśāradya ; 4 Pritisammṛit ; 18 Āveśika-bandha-dharma. Nature of Dhāraṇis, relation of letters of the alphabet to them.

Chapter X. Duties of the 1st stage—Ten Parikarmas. Ditto of the 2nd stage—8 Dharma-abhikshrās. Ditto of the 3rd stage. Elaboration of the duties of these stages.

Chapter XI. The doctrine of Mahāyāna and its advantages derived, principally if not entirely, from its recognition of the greatness of Śūnyavāda.

Chapter XII. The Prajñā pāramitā includes descriptions of all qualities, and their nature and effects. The subject only begins and is carried over to the next volume.

VOLUME II.

Chapter XII (continued). On vacuity in relation to matter. The other (ākāśa), the best illustration of vacuity. Vacuity not subject to destruction.

Chapter XIII. All qualities are unreal, as a dream, an illusion, or a mirage. Knowing this, Bodhisattva never fears anything. Qualities do not affect him. To him there is nothing eternal, nothing transient, nothing painful, nothing pleasant. Transcendental powers derivable from the Prajñā-pāramitā. Pāramitās of two kinds, worldly and transcendental. Their descriptions.

Chapter XIV—XVI. The principles of Prajñā-pāramitā as imparted by the Lord to Indra. The end sought is the attainment of vacuity.

Chapters XVII—XX. A summary method of attaining the end by practising the six pāramitās, and by worshipping the relics of Buddha in chaityas.

Chapters XXI—XXV. Instructions of Subhūti to Ānanda, showing how all the pāramitās are included in the Prajñā-pāramitā, and how the attainment of the latter accomplishes the attainment of everything.

VOLUME III.

Chapter XXVI. Bhagavān's instruction to the son of Sāradvatī, to the purport that Bhagavān is the thorough master of the Prajñā-pāramitā, and that those who, knowing the nature of duty, do not accept the pāramitās, and revile Bhagavān are doomed to endless pain and suffering in hell, and are subjected to other punishments.

Chapter XXVII. On purification and purified knowledge.

Chapter XXVIII. The mode of acquiring the Prajñā-pāramitā, and the advantages thereof. The fruits of reciting it on particular days in the presence of (an image of ?) Bhagavān.

Chapter XXIX. On the vacuity of all qualities explained in detail.

Chapter XXX. On the attainment of Yoga by a Bodhisattva.

Chapter XXXI. On the Sūtrānta doctrine, its utter worthlessness compared to the vacuous doctrine. No Bodhisattva should accept it.

Chapter XXXII. Defects of the Sūtrānta doctrine ; the influence of Māra, how to overcome the same.

Chapter XXXIII. The whole of the Prajñā-pāramitā was disclosed by the Lord himself, for the good of creation. No Deva, now spirit, nor human being can teach it. True knowledge can be acquired solely through the Prajñā-pāramitā.

Chapter XXXIV. The falsity of all doctrines not founded on the Prajñā-pāramitā and their unfitness for the ultimate end of man. They should not therefore be accepted.

Chapter XXXV. All objects attainable by the study of the doctrine of Nihilism.

Chapter XXXVI. Training fit for the attainment of the doctrine of Nihilism.

Chapter XXXVII. Training for the purpose. Suppression of all worldly desires. Ascent from the first or Srāvaka stage to that of Pratyeka buddha stage. Longings and ideas. Power of assuming any form at will.

VOLUME IV.

Chapter XXXVIII. Omniformity of shape. Pain and other accidents. They should all be associated with vacuity. The relation of shape pain &c. to vacuity is efferent not afferent. Derivation of Tathāgata implying this efferent action. Tathāgata knows the ultimate vacuity of all things. Nihilism should therefore be studied through the Prajñā-pāramitā.

Chapter XXXIX. Purification of the body, mind, speech ; avoidance of false notions.

Chapter XL. All qualities mutable. The Lord alone immutable.

Chapter XLI. Praise of the Prajñā-pāramitā.

Chapter XLII. Purification of Buddhism by the suppression of sensuous wants and feelings.

Chapter XLIII. Visit of the River Ganges to the Lord. Miracles worked at the time.

Chapter XLIV. Attainment of the doctrine of Nihilism through Prajñā-pāramitā.

Chapter XLV. All qualities compared to dreams.

Chapter XLVI. Doubts and disbelief characterise sinful men.

Chapter XLVII. The necessity of studying the Prajñā-pāramitā for the suppression of all qualities, thoughts and ideas through dispassion.

Chapter XLVIII. The way of making the mind immense in meditation.

Chapter XLIX. All qualities being vain, the necessity of the religion of Buddha established.

Chapter L. Through the Prajñā-pāramitā all qualities cease to be perceptible.

Chapter LI. Through it Māra becomes speared through, and friendliness for creation is promoted.

Chapter LII. The mode and advantage of practising the six pāramitās.

Chapter LIII. The practice of Śīla-pāramitā (good conduct).

Chapter LIV. Vacuity in relation to qualities explained.

Chapter LV. Vacuity defined.

Chapter LVI. Preliminary study of the elementary principles of good.

Chapter LVII. The necessity of constant attention to Śīlapāramitā.

Chapter LVIII. Kṣhānti-pāramitā explained.

Chapter LIX. Dhyāna-pāramitā, contemplation and its modifications.

Chapter LX. Vacuous nature of all qualities.

Chapter LXI. Detailed account of the six Pāramitās.

Chapter LXII. Destruction of illusion through the Prajñā-pāramitā.

Chapter LXIII. The practice of the six Pāramitās, and the advantages thereby derived by Bodhisattva.

Chapter LXIV. Samādhi and its varieties, how produced.

Chapter LXV. Falsehood, incoherence, wickedness explained.

Chapter LXVI. Fruits of knowledge, friendliness, benevolence and other good qualities.

Chapter LXVI. Essential unreality of all qualities.

Chapter LXVIII. The six Pāramitās whereby Bodhisattvas rescue creation from pain and suffering.

Chapter LXIX. How Bodhisattvas attain the position of Tathāgatas.

Chapter LXX. How and why Bodhisattvas act in accordance with the belief of the unreal being real.

Chapter LXXI. Unreality of qualities again explained.

Chapter LXXII. All qualities being unreal or vacuous, the conclusion follows that the world is essentially unreal.

The Dāśasāhasrikā is included in the Japanese Tripīṭhaka, and occurs under the name of "Mo-no-pan-jo-po-lo-mi-king." It was translated into the Chinese by Chu-Fo-nien and others, of the Tsin dynasty, (Circa, 265-313). The Tripīṭhaka includes two other works, both short, one entitled "Fo-moo-par-tih-tsang-pan-jo-po-lo-mi-king" or "the Prajñā-pāramitā sūtra of the mother of Buddha," and the other "Fo-show-ti-shi-pan-jo-po-lo-mi-to-sin king", or "Buddha recites the sūtra called the heart of the Prajñā-pāramitā of Śākrarāja." Of these I have met with no Sanskrit exemplar.

At the end of the first khaṇḍa there are some verses which give the names of the copyists and the dates when the four volumes were completed. According to these verses, the first volume was completed at the monastery of Chakravahāra, in the town of Lalitāpurī, in Nepal, by Dhanadatta Vajrivīra, on Thursday, the 10th of the waxing moon during the ascendancy of Ristakā constellation in the month of Āshāḍha, in the year 923. The second volume was completed on Friday, the 11th of the waxing moon, in the month of Chaitra, of the Nepalese year 924, by Viradatta Vajrāchārya. The third volume was completed on the day dedicated to the worship of Lakshmī in the year 924, by Siṅhadatta Vajradhṛik. The fourth volume was completed on Friday, the 9th of the moon, in the month of Agrahāyana, in the year 920, by Vidyādatta Vājri. The Pāñchavimśati Sāhasri was completed on Thursday, the 4th of the waxing moon in the month of Phālguna of the year 926, by Dhanadatta and Viradatta. The dates being Nepalese must correspond with A. D. 1803, 1804, 1804 and 1801. The dates are reported at the end of each volume.

There is in the Asiatic Society's Library a Nepalese version of this work in four volumes, but I have not been able to read it. It is numbered A 5 to A 8.

PRAJÑĀPARAMITĀ, ASHTASĀHASRIKĀ.

No. A. 15.

Substance, Palm-leaf, $23 \times 2\frac{1}{2}$ inches. Folia 182. Lines on a page, 6. Extent in ślokas, 8,190. Character, Nepalese. Date, Nepalese Era, 191.=A. D. 1231. Appearance old. Prose. Correct.

Very old, very carefully and well written, and profusely illustrated. The boards were richly painted, but the paint on the outer side has blistered, cracked, and have been smeared over with dabs of sandal paste, the work having been worshipped for generations past. On the inside, each board shows four figures of Buddha in a seated position, in the attitude of lecturing, with a devotee, on each side. The first leaf has a vignette showing a Buddhist figure, as above, surrounded by a group of seven disciples. This vignette, slightly differing in detail, is repeated on the second leaf. On the 12th leaf, at the end of chapter 1st, there is a vignette showing a flesh-coloured female squatting on a white carpet, and expounding something to a group of four disciples, two of white and two of yellow complexion. On the 18th leaf, at the end of chapter 2nd, there is a red coloured female standing amidst lotuses, and four devotees white, yellow, green and red, kneeling before her. On the 34th leaf there is a flesh-coloured standing female, dressed in the Bengali style in a red sārī, and has on the left a yellow boat with a bull's head for a prow, and in it a white female holding an oar and a jar for load, and below the boat a blue female seated amidst lotuses. On the right there is a temple having in it a white male figure. Above the temple there are two fishes revolving about each other. On the 37th leaf there are figures of Buddha with two devotees with a red screen and two chowries hanging behind. On leaf 49th is depicted Padmapāñi, with 4 devotees of 4 different colours. On leaf 62nd, there are a yellow female standing in a plaintain grove, and celestial beings flying in the air. Some of the vignettes show monsters of different kinds. One is a white coloured ten-handed female, having over her head a second head of a blue colour. Others have four or six arms. Some are attended by hideous monsters. In one, Buddha is attended by two white elephants, each having eight heads. On the last page, there is a white female with six hands, dressed in a tiger skin, and having a two-handed female child on her lap. In two separate vignettes on this page there are two chaityas.

This is the shortest abridgment of the work noticed under the last preceding number. Its specific name is Ashtasāhasrikā, or "the work of 8,000 verses." As the handiest of the five redactions, it is held in the highest appreciation, and is included in the nine canonical works, or "Dharmas," of the Nepalese Buddhists. It is divided into 32 chapters or Parivartas. The salutation at its beginning is somewhat peculiar. Instead of the usual formula of salutation to the three Ratnas, or to Buddha, or to Bodhisattvas, adoration is paid to the subject of the work, i.e., the work itself, the renowned Prajñā-pāramitā, as "the source of knowledge of Tathāgatas." The name being in the feminine gender, the work is addressed throughout as a female. The scene is laid on the Vulture Peak, (Grīdhrakūṭa), near Rājagṛiha. When Bhagavān Śākya was once sojourning there in the company of a large number of disciples and followers, Sāriputra opened a discourse by asking Subhūti information on the principles of the Prajñā-pāramitā, and the replies and discussions which followed from the subject of the work.

CONTENTS. 1. On the knowledge of all forms or archetypes.

II. The conversion of Śakra, the lord of the Devas, by the Bodhisattva through instruction in the Prajñā-pāramitā.

III—IV. On the merits of the Prajñā-pāramitā, as the means of salvation, and how the same should be appreciated.

V. The advantages of reciting, hearing, writing, wearing on one's person, or giving away the work to fit persons.

VI. On the modifications of impetus, or the advantages of virtuous actions as means of Bodhi knowledge, or the modifications of those actions ultimately resulting in knowledge.

VII. On retributions for worldly actions, and salvation therefrom through the Prajñā-pāramitā.

VIII. On the gradation of modifications, or progressive changes for the better, leading ultimately to perfection.

IX—X. Praise of Prajñā-pāramitā, and the advantages of hearing it, &c., as in chapter IV, but more detailed.

XI. The works of Māra which obstruct the light of the Prajñā-pāramitā in Bodhisattvas.

XII. Creation, welfare of created beings due to Prajñā-pāramitā.

XIII. On the inconceivable, showing that all qualities are inconceivable.

XIV. Those who have faith in Sambodhi can acquire the Prajñā-pāramitā, proved by examples.

XV. Instructions in the Prajñā-pāramitā, by proficient teachers.

XVI. On the origin and purport of the phrase anuttarām-samyak sambodhimabhisambuti-dhyastathāgata.

XVII. On the immutability of the form of the Bodhisattva.

XVIII. Nihilism (śūnyatā) defined.

XIV. In the field of Buddhism there are no roads infested by villains, or thieves, or drink, or disease, or famine.

XX. On the accessibility of the Prajñā-pāramitā by an easy means.

XXI. On the mischievous works of Māra, obstructing progress of Bodhi knowledge and corrupting devout persons.

XXII. For the attainment of Samyak-sambodhī, virtuous actions are indispensable, and they are best attained through the Prajñā-pāramitā.

XXIII. On the merit of hearing &c., the Prajñā-pāramitā, and the invincibility thereby acquired against enemies, &c.

XXIV. On vanity or vain-gloriousness.

XXV. On instruction in Bodhi knowledge.

XXVI. The lord instructs Subhūti how the illusive unsteady mind can acquire Bodhi knowledge.

XXVII. Description of Māra and of his attempts to corrupt earnest enquirers.

XXVIII. On the merit of strewing flowers on Chaityas, &c.

XXIX. On following the doctrine of the Prajñā-pāramitā.

XXX—XXXI. Questions and answers on following the Bodhisattva and his instructions.

XXXII. On the merits of instruction in the Prajñā-pāramitā. Wherver it is learnt and encouraged, there the Bodhisattva imparts religious instruction.

PRAJÑĀ-PĀRAMITĀ, PAÑCHAVIṂSĀTI-SĀHASRIKĀ.

पञ्चविंशतिसाहस्रिका प्रज्ञापारमिता ।

Substance, country-made yellow paper, 18×6 inches. Folia, 400. Lines on a page, 12. Extent in ślokas, 20,045. Character, Newār, Date, N. S. 926. Appearance, old. Prose. Incorrect.

A digest of the large work on metaphysics described under the Nos. A 1 to A 4. Like it, it is in prose. Its extent is usually reckoned at 25,000 ślokas, but the codex under examination does not come up to that extent. Roughly calculated it is limited to 20,045 ślokas, and this would suggest the idea that it is defective ; but from its beginning and colophon it would seem that it is complete. It is divided into eight chapters, each called a parivarta, as in the larger work. Though professedly a digest, the arrangement of the work is not founded on the plan of the Śatasāhasrikā, and the treatment of the subjects is generally different. In fact the work is an independent one on the subject of Nihilism bearing on the attributes of Buddha.

The first chapter is devoted to sarvākārajñatā, or the knowledge of all forms and qualities by the Bodhisattva through the medium of the Prajñā-pāramitā. The second is entitled mārgajñatā, or the knowledge of all modes of salvation ; it is based on various purifications of the intellect, mind, body, &c. The third is sarvajñatā or "omniscience," which is attainable by thoroughly understanding the nature of Nihilism in relation to charity, good conduct, and the other four pāramitās. The fourth is sarvākārābhisambodha, or cognizance of all forms whereby the Bodhisattva acquires a right understanding of the various phases of the mind under different circumstances. The fifth is mūrdhaprāptana-pūrvabodha, or the way in which the Bodhisattva stores every form of understanding and all knowledge in his head, so that he can know all and everything superhuman even in his dream without any actual perception. The sixth is ekakṣhṇāvisambodha, or knowledge of all times present, past and future. In treating of it the succession of the six pāramitās, including charity, good conduct, mercy, vigour, meditation, and true knowledge, have been described at length. The seventh is dharmakāya, or qualities as affecting the conduct of the Bodhisattva. The eighth is moksha, or lessons on the means of attaining Nirvāṇa.

The codex was copied as stated elsewhere, p. 183 in the Nepalese year=A. D. 1806.

An Avadāna in praise of giving alms-bowls to Buddhist mendicants. The story runs that Sarvānanda, king of the great city of Dīpa-vatī, once visited the great Vihāra of Prasannaśīla, and thence brought Buddha Dīpaṅkara to his metropolis, and presented him an alms-bowl full of rice, and thereupon the Buddha expatiated on the merits of giving alms. The first seven folia of the work being missing, the history of the work cannot be ascertained.

This is a collection of manuals for the performance of Pūjā to different divinities. The first folium and several folia at the end being lost, neither the name of the author, nor the history of the work, can be ascertained from the codex.

In the portion which has come under my examination I find rituals for the worship of the following divinities, viz., (1), Kubjikāgūhyeśvarī, (the secret hunchbacked goddess); (2), Harabhairava; (3), Harasiddhidevī; (4), Chandeśvarī; (5), Naraḍurgā, (offering her oleander flowers—kāravirajapā); (6), presiding divinity of houses (on occupying a new house); (7), the discus of Paśchimeśvara; (8), Nāsikā, the presiding divinity of the nostrils; (9), Gaṇeśa; (10), Brahmāṇī; (11), Maheśvarī; (12), Kaumārī; (13), Vaishṇavi; (14), Vārāhī; (15), Indrāṇī; (16), Chāmuṇḍā; (17), Mahālakshmi, (Nos. 10 to 17 represent the Aṣṭamātrikās of the Tantras; see my Antiquities of Orissa, II. p. 140); (18) Kulachakreśvarī; (19) Revanta Mahābhairava; (20), Mahālakshmi; (21), Jayavatsalā; (22), Pūrṇāvatī Brahmāṇī; (23), Śikāsachchhanda Mahābhairava; (24), Kaumārī and Chāmuṇḍā together; (25), Nṛityeśvara Mahābhairava; (26), Bhīmasena Mahābhairava; (27), Ugrachandā; (28), Martyeśvarī; (29), Jhaṅkeśvarī; (30), minor divinities. The divinities noticed are all more or less known in the Hindu Tantras, and the work is more of a Tāntric ritualistic character than that of a Buddhist manual.

The codex being defective both at the beginning and at the end the initial and the concluding words are not given here.

A collection of stories regarding persons who in former times became Buddhas. The stories are said to have been related by a saint named Upagupta to the emperor Aśoka. Aśoka, surrounded by a large assembly of pious citizens of Pāṭaliputra, was eagerly awaiting to hear some religious discourse when Upagupta presented himself before him, and narrated the following stories to satisfy his intense thirst for religious knowledge.

1. Story of Kauśiḡha—Kauśiḡhavīryyasahanāvadāna. Once on a time Lord Buddha was delivering a lecture on religion to a crowded congregation in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada at Śrāvastā. Gods, demons, and men, eager to receive his instructions, assembled round him in great numbers.

He discoursed on the religion which showers its blessings in all the stages,—at the beginning, in the middle, and at the end. All came except Putraka,—a man of consequences (Mahājana), proud of his wealth,—who was a disciple of a Tirthika, named Pūraṇa. By worshipping Brāhmaṇic gods. Putraka had obtained a son named Nanda, who at the age of six fell ill of anaemia, which prostrated him so much that he could not rise from his bed. Though in such a pitiable state of health, he mastered all the sciences of his day, and became devoutly religious. Putraka, anxious to relieve the sufferings of his son, implored his preceptor for help. Pūraṇa assured him that Nanda would miraculously recover his strength and rise up when six sages, Pūraṇa included, would make their appearance before him. But his assurance proved false. Instead of rising up at their appearance, Nanda could not make up his mind to see them. The wise men were put out of countenance. The omniscient Lord, observing their confusion and the helplessness of the dejected family, desired to bless it with his presence. Golden rays issuing from his glorious person preceeded to Nanda, as the harbinger of the Lord, raised up his drooping spirit, and dispersed the gloom of his mind. At the most blessed appearance of the Lord, Nanda recovered his strength, got up from his bed, fell at the feet of the Lord, and welcomed him. The Lord gave him a sandal-wood stick and told him that whenever he would strike that stick he would get a profusion of wealth. He went once for commerce in a foreign country, gained much wealth, and, returning home, invited the Lord to a sumptuous repast. The Lord accepted the invitation, and, after the repast, smiled, whereupon Ānanda asked the Lord : “why do you smile ?”

The Lord replied, Nanda is sure to become a great Sugata, Kauśiḡha by name.

2. Story of Chandana—Snātāvadna. When the lord was residing in the Jetavana grove, five hundred merchants, on their way back from the island of Ratnākara, lost their way in a desert. Wandering in the immeasurable waste of sand, scorched by the burning rays of the meridian sun, they were in great need of water, to allay their intense thirst.

They prayed Śiva, Varuṇa and the whole host of Brāhmaṇic gods, but in vain. But no sooner they prayed to Buddha than he (Buddha) desired in his mind "let Indra send them a shower," and Indra, without the least delay, sent them a refreshing shower, which relieved them from their sufferings. All of them became great Bodhisattvas afterwards. The Bhikshus asked the Lord why should Indra send a shower at the desire of the Lord. The Lord said :—"Once on a time a great Buddha, named Chandana, preached all over the world. On one occasion he resided for three months at the capital of a king who was one of his ardent disciples. During the period of the Lord's residence in the capital there was a great draught. The king ordered a great tank to be dug, poured all sorts of perfumes and flowered into it, and compelled all his subjects to pour the perfumed water, lifted in golden vases, over the Lord's head. Indra was so well pleased with the honour done to Sugata that he poured immediately a heavy shower of rain. The king raised perfumed stūpas over the nails and hairs of the Lord, and prayed that he may become a Buddha. I am, O bhikshus, that king."

3. Story of the Discus—Chakrāvadāna. When the lord was residing in the Bamboo grove at Rājgriha, there was a merchant in that city who had a wife devotedly attached to him. His income always fell short of his expenditure ; so his hordes were on the point of being exhausted. On one occasion his wife gave him a lecture on the advantages of affluence, which induced him to undertake a distant expedition. In the absence of her dearly loved husband, the merchant's wife began to worship Viṣṇu for his prosperity and safe return. She vowed to offer a golden discus to Viṣṇu on the event of her husband's safe return. Her husband came back a rich man. True to her vow, she proceeded to the temple of Viṣṇu to offer that god the promised discus. The Lord made his appearance before the devout lady in her way to the shrine. Finding the Lord Śrīghana with all the thirty-two signs of greatness and eighty minor indications on his person, she offered him the discus, heedless of all the remonstrances of her companions. Not content with offering the discus, she worshipped the Lord, fell into a profound meditation, and prayed from the inmost core of her heart that she may become a Buddha Sugata, free from all pains, and having complete control over the senses. The Lord blessed her saying, "she shall become Chakrāntara, a great Patyeka Buddha." The discus remained for a time over the head of Buddha, and then, by his permission, adorned the heads of Hari and Hara. The merchant, too, at the instance of his wife, became a worshipper of the "three jewels."

4. Story of a ghost—Pretāvadāna. When the lord was in the Bamboo grove, Maudgalāyana, one of his disciples, went to a cremation ground, and there saw a ghost covered over with coarse hair, with a belly swollen to a mountain's height, with a conical mouth tapering to a point, suffering intensely from excruciating pains and a thirst which could not be alleviated, and repeatedly falling insensible into hysteric fits. On his return he enquired of the Lord the cause of the ghost's suffering. The Lord said the ghost was that of a woman who, in one of her previous existences, had refused to give the Lord Kāśyapa a palmful of water when he was very thirsty, and had haughtily insulted her husband when he upbraided her for the refusal. The Lord added she was to be rescued from her pains by Lokeśvara, son of Jina.

7. Story of a Devaputra who had been cursed to become a hog—Śūkarāvadāna. Once on a time a Devaputra came to know that he would fall from heaven and become a hog in his next existence. The idea of degradation proved too much for him ; he fell insensible. Indra, by pouring on him a shower of nectar, restored him to his senses, and advised him to worship the three jewels whereby he may escape the dreaded fate. On account of his devotion to Buddha, Dharma, and Saṅgha he was born in the region of Tushita. Indra knew from the Lord that his advice was the best that could have been given to the Devaputra.

8. Story about questions asked by certain gods—Praśnottarāvalāna. Once on a time the Lord, after imparting religious instructions to his hearers, retired to his chamber and, sitting on a sofa, fell into a vein of intense devotion feeling. Gods came down from heaven to receive his answers to the following recondite questions :

Question. Who attain a good hereafter ?

Answer. Those who lay out gardens, span rivers with bridges, build reservoirs under water-falls ; who are faithful, well-behaved, veracious, merciful and free from vanity.

Q. Who goes to hell ?

A. The blasphemer.

Q. Who multiplies his sins ?

A. The blasphemer.

Q. Who is strong among donors ?

A. One who distributes rice in charity.

- Q. Who shines most ?
 A. One who distributes clothes to the poor.
 Q. Who is happy ?
 A. One who gives water to the thirsty.
 Q. Who has the finest person ?
 A. One who gives lamps.
 Q. Which is the keenest dart ?
 A. Malicious words.
 Q. Which is the most fatal poison ?
 A. Anger.
 Q. Which is the most consuming fire ?
 A. Envy.
 Q. Which is the most impenetrable darkness ?
 A. Ignorance. (Avidyā.)
 Q. What is to be accepted ?
 A. That which you want.
 Q. What is to be rejected ?
 A. That which you have.
 Q. What is the best armour ?
 A. Forgiveness.
 Q. What is the sharpest weapon ?
 A. A penetrating intellect.
 Q. Who is the worst thief ?
 A. One who is clever in sophistry.
 Q. What is wealth to a good man ?
 A. His character.

The gods returned to heaven well pleased with these answers.

11. Story of Hastakā—Hastakāvadāna. There lived in the city of Śrāvastī a householder as rich as Kuveras. He had a child who remembered the events of his previous existences. The moment he was born he kissed his hands, saying "O my hands, I get thee back after a long time." He was named Hastakā, because he kissed his hands. When grown up, Hastakā became a disciple of the Lord, renounced the world, and was raised to the rank of an Arhat. Lord Buddha narrated the following story to explain the strange circumstance at the birth of Hastakā. Lord Kāśyapa preached his religion at Benares. He had two Bhikshus under him. One learned and pious, the other ignorant. The learned Bhikshu used to take the ignorant one with him wherever he was invited to a feast. On a certain occasion Mahāpūṇya, the learned Bhikshu, did not find his companion, and was obliged to take another with him. To his great surprise he found his old companion at the feast, and taunted him for coming to a feast without an invitation. The taunts enraged the ignorant Bhikshu, who cursed Mahāpūṇya to be born without hands, so that we may not again enjoy a feast. On return home, Mahāpūṇya engaged himself in a samādhi to wipe away the evil of the curse. The ignorant Bhikshu, seeing him so engaged and repenting of his hasty conduct, fell at his feet, and prayed forgiveness. Mahāpūṇya readily granted this ; and said, "Listen, my boy, I forgive you the offence you have committed through gross ignorance, but you must act according to the directions I give you. Injure no animated being ; take nothing that is not given you ; abstain from female society ; tell no untruth ; indulge not in wicked and scurrilous speech." He did so, but for the sin of cursing an innocent person he was doomed to be born without hands for five hundred births. Now through the merit of following Mahāpūṇya's advice he re-got his hands.

12. Story of Sārthavāha—Ratnottamāvadāna. Sārthavāha, a rich merchant of Śrāvastī, had twice gone to foreign countries on commercial speculations, and had twice been shipwrecked. Before proceeding a third time he invited a large number of Brāhmanas, whom he fed sumptuously, and promised rich rewards should he return safely from his venture. He joined a party of merchants and was so far successful that his transactions proved highly profitable ; but in his way home his ship was overtaken by a storm and drowned in the middle of the sea. He escaped with his life by sticking to a plank. This unnerved him quite, and he was very desponding. His wife, a pious woman, thereupon advised him to seek the asylum of Buddha. He did so, and promised many gifts to Tathāgatas in the event of his next venture proving successful. The blessings of the Lord had their fruit. Sārthavāha returned from his next voyage a very rich man. He redeemed his promise to the Lord, and gave the Lord a profusion of jewels which changed into a parasol and stood high over the Lord. The Lord was greatly pleased and said, Sārthavāha would, in a future life, be a Buddha under the name of Ratnottama.

SADDHARMA-PUNÐARĪKA.

Substance, yellow-coloured Nepalese paper, 15×5½ inches. Folia, 131. Lines on a page, 10. Extent in ślokas, 2,800. Character, Newāri. Appearance, old. Date, ? Prose and verse. Incorrect.

An exposition of the leading topics of the Buddhist religion, forming one of the nine works constituting the scriptures of the Nepalese Buddhists. Mr. Hodgson describes it as "a Vyākaraṇa of the sort called gāthā. It contains an account of the Mahā and other Dīpa Dānas, or of the lights in honour of the Buddhas, and Bodhisattvas ; with narrations of the lives of several former Buddhas, by Śākya, as well as prophetic indications of the future eminence of some of his disciples.

Speakers and hearers Śākya, Maitreya, Mañjuśrī ; &c.” The work was translated into Chinese by Che-yen of the Sung dynasty (960—1278), and issued under the name of Fa hwa-sun-mui-king. An epitome of it appears among the books of the Western Tsin catalogue, and a commentary of it in select explanations under the name of Fa-hwa-in-kia (Beal., pp. 14, 104). M. Burnouf’s translation of the work into French was published in 1852, under the name of Le Lotus de la Bonne Loi. The scene is laid on the Vulture Peak (Gīrdhrakūṭa) in Behar, and the work is divided into 27 chapters.

CONTENTS : I. On one occasion when the Lord was sojourning on the Vulture Peak unear Rājagṛīha with a retinue of twelve hundred Bhikshus, he felt a desire to expound the principles of Mahānirdeśa, or the great identification of all things. Thereupon he performed the Samādhi called antarnirdeśa, or “intellectual ascertainment.” While he was so engaged, showers of flowers fell on the place, and all Buddhist sacred places quaked. The Devas, impelled by wonder, came to the place. They found rays of light issuing from between the eyebrows of the saint, and cast a blaze of light on all sacred places. Maitreya, beholding this, asked of Mañjuśrī the cause thereof, and was informed in reply that the miracle indicated that the Lord was about to expound the work under notice on the great religion, and a summary is given of the entire work.

II. The Lord explains to Śāriputra how former Buddhas had come to know all that nobody else knew, and how they expounded the great religion.

III. Śāriputra enquires why had so many Buddhas expounded the same religion ? The Lord assures Śāriputra that he would be in a distant future time a Buddha under the name of Padmaprabha, and that his place of enlightenment will be Viraja. Adverting to the three Yānas, he says they are but different methods of attaining the same end. This is illustrated by a parable. When a house is on fire, the father, to save his children from being burnt, says, “boys, there are in the field horses, elephants, goats, pigs and sheep ; go there and I shall give them to you to play with ;” they go out and are then carried away to the same haven of security. So do Buddhas provide the three Yānas to save mankind from the burning world. Nor do they thereby commit a falsehood, for whatever the Yāna adopted, the end is the same.

IV. The parable is elaborated by Subhūti, Kātyāyana, Mahākāśyapa, and Mahāmaudgalyāyana, who illustrate the subject by adverting to the sons of rich and poor men, the sons of rich men gain wealth by inheritance, poor men become rich by commerce in foreign countries, and when all become rich, the result becomes the same.

V. The Lord illustrates the subject by adverting to the same rain promoting the growth of different kinds of plants, and the same sun and moon enlightening all objects, concluding by saying that though the Yānas were different, the religion taught was the same. The question is then asked by Mahākāśyapa as to whether Nirvāṇa was the same, or were there different kinds of it ? The Lord declares it to be one and the same, and illustrates it by the parable of the born blind, who does not admit that there are different forms and colours and such objects as the sun, the moon, and the stars, but, on being cured of his blindness by proper drugs administered by competent physicians, becomes conscious of the truth, so the blinded by ignorance have occasion for various remedies according to the nature of their ailments, and ultimately come to the same knowledge.

VI. The Lord predicts how and when and where the four questions will become Buddhas in remote future times.

VII. Account of an ancient Buddha named Mahābhijñānjñānābhīhu who had sixteen sons, and who first inculcated the three Yānas. His doctrines are also explained.

VIII. The Lord predicts how, when, and where Pūrṇa and four others of his disciples would become Buddhas in future times.

IX. Similar predictions regarding Ānanda, Rāhula and others.

X. The Lord declares that whoever will listen with becoming faith and devotion to even one verse of the law as explained by him in the Yāna-sūtra will attain the perfect Buddha knowledge.

XI. An apparition of a Stūpa appears in the sky over the Lord, and heavenly voices proclaim the merits of the Lord of the Saddharma-puṇḍarika. The Lord explains the meaning of the stūpa, and then enters it. Thence he expounds the law.

XII. In a large assembly of Bhikshus, the Lord predicts when and whom Gautamī and Yaśodharā would become Buddhas.

XIII. Directions regarding the expounding of the Saddharma-puṇḍarika, after the Nirvāṇa of the Lord. Improper places and immoral persons denied the benefit of the Lord.

XIV. Permission granted to eight foreign Bodhisattvas to expound the the Saddharma-puṇḍarika, and prediction as to what would be the result thereof. Numerous Bodhisattvas spring up from under the earth, and this miracle is expounded. Maitreya asks how should these have expounded the perfect Bodhi when the same was first obtained by the Lord under the Bodhi tree.

XV. The Lord explains this paradox. He says that the fact of his acquiring the Bodhi knowledge under the fig-tree should not be borne in mind ; the knowledge he acquired had existed from long before, and it should be looked upon as of remote antiquity.

XVI—XVIII. On the merits of the work and the advantages of hearing it read and expounded.

XIX. Story of Sadāparibhūta, a Bhikshu, who used to recite twenty Gāthās and thereby obtain alms. The merits of those gāthās. This Sadāparibhūta was no other than the Lord himself in a former birth.

XX. Directions to those who came from under the earth to preach the Saddharma-puṇḍarika. A miracle produced by the Lord putting forth his tongue which touched the region of Brahmā.

XXI. Advantages of putting on the work and magic formulae as charms.

XXII. Story of Sarvasattvapriyadarśana, a Bodhisattva, who wrapped his body in cloth steeped in aromatic oils, and set fire to it to worship a Buddha, named Chandra-vimāla-sūryaprabhāśrī, for twelve hundred years, and, in the Nirvāṇa of that Tathāgata, caused to be erected 84,000 chaityas, which he worshipped for 72,000 years. The Lord was that Bodhisattva.

XXIII. Story of Gadgadasvara, who worshipped stūpas with many precious offerings. He was the same with the Lord.

XXIV. Account of Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara.

XXV. Story of Subhānyaha, who with his two sons Vimāla-garbha and Vimāla-netra and his wife Vimāla datta, worshipped a Tathāgata named Jaladharagarjita-ghoṣa-susvara-nakṣatra-saṅkumita, and studied the Saddharma-puṇḍarika. In the time of Śākya these were born as Bodhisattvas of the names of Padmaśrī, Bhāisajya-rāya, Bhāishajya-samudyata, and Vairocana, respectively.

XXVI. Samantabhadra Bodhisattva promises that he will not only not subject to retributive punishment those who will wear the Saddharma-puṇḍarika, but reward them.

XXVII. The Lord enjoins that his followers should teach, expound and promote the spread of the religion of the Saddharma-puṇḍarika.

SAMĀDHIRĀJA.

Substance, yellow Nepalese paper, $14\frac{1}{2} \times 3\frac{1}{2}$ inches. Folia, 226.
Lines on a page, 6. Extent in ślokas, 5,339. Character, Newārī.
Appearance, old. Prose and verse. Incorrect.

A work of the class called Vyākaraṇa, or narrative, in which various forms of meditations are described at length, pre-eminence being given to a meditation or Samādhi called 'the king of Samādhis.' Its object is to show the process by which a votary of Buddha may rise to the highest eminence, each chapter showing a step in the gradual progress of the human mind in its moral condition, and reciting one or more stories on moral excellence in illustration of the different stages of that progress. The principal interlocutors are Buddha and Chandraprabha, and the scene is laid on the Grīdhra-kūṭa hill where Buddha expounded the principles of a religion which showers its blessings at all its stages, at the beginning, at the middle, and at the end.

CONTENTS : Chapter I. Chandraprabha asked the Lord how can the Buddha be known ? How can a man become veracious ? How can he become an object of reverence even to the gods ? And how can he obtain intuitive perception of things ?

The Lord replied, that a Bodhisattva can easily attain all these, by practising the king of Samādhis named Sarvadharmasvabhāvasamatāvipaśchita Samādhi. First of all a Bodhisattva should be even-tempered, indifferent to the pleasures and pains of the world. Then, he should try to shower benefits on others in spite of all the obstacles that may be thrown in his way. When he becomes thoroughly even-tempered, benevolent and persevering, he is fit to attain those conditions which prepare the mind for the great Samādhi. These conditions are Kārya-samvara, Vāk-samvara &c. *

II. The lord said "When I was a Chakravarti, I placed myself under the guidance of many Arhats and young Tathāgatas on this very hill Gṛidhrakūṭa. The last of my spiritual guides was Śālendra, a king, who lived for six hundred and seventy millions of years, I worshipped him for full one hundred thousand millions of years, and he blessed me with the knowledge of the great Samādhi. The worsnip of Tathāgatas is one of the principal conditions of the Samādhi.

III. He only is fit to receive the knowledge of the Samādhi who is prepared to proclaim the merits of the Tathāgatas who have preceded him. The merits of a Tathāgata are, that he is perfectly enlightened, learned, well-conducted, well-bestowed ; that he is perfectly conversant with the ways of men ; he is without a superior ; he has a complete control over the senses.

IV. The real nature of the Samādhi is that the mind, unclouded by ignorance, should be fixed on one point. The knowledge of restraint put upon by ignorance, removal of the burdens of the world, the control of passions, and the correction of faults,—these also are essential to the Samādhi.

V. In ancient times the Jambūdvipa was divided between two kings named Dṛiḍhabala and Mahābala. Ghoshadatta, one of the most ancient Tathāgatas, made his appearance in the kingdom of Mahābala, induced him to enter the hermitage, and taught him the great Samādhi. Mahābala imparted that knowledge of the Samādhi to innumerable creatures for a hundred million kalpas, and afterwards at the end of a hundred thousand full kalpas attained nirvāṇa. The myriads, who had been present at the time the king received instruction from Ghosha- datta also, after a long time, attained the highest object of their wishes. "So" said the Lord "he who wants to receive the knowledge of the Samādhi must renounce the world, and rise superior to all terrestrial attractions."

VI. One of the principal conditions of receiving the knowledge to the Samādhi is, that the receiver should be always ready and eager of honour all Tathāgatas, whether "in flesh" or in the nirvāṇa state, with offerings of cloth, alms bowls, flowers, stūpas, &c.

VII. Three kshāntis are indispensable to the Samādhi. The first kshāntī is that one should not quarrel with another, and should not speak unnecessarily. He should be intent on the acquirement of merit, and should consider all phenomenon as illusions. The second is that the mind should be full of goodness (Satvaguṇa) ; it should be persevering in doing good to others, and should consider all creatures as equal. The third is that the devotee should perceive the Lokanātha in all the quarters of the universe.

VII. The Bodhisattva who seeks to attain the knowledge of the Samādhi learns to regard all phenomena as abhāva or unsubstantial. For instance, the phenomena of colour, sound, smell, &c., are not produced by causes, nay they are not produced at all. They cannot be defined, cannot be restrained. They are transient, because they cannot be always found in the same substance. They are void. They were inert before their manifestation. A Bodhisattva should be thoroughly conversant with the abhāvasvabhāva or nihilistic character of all phenomena.

There lived, innumerable kalpas ago, a Tathāgata, who, the moment he was born, rose to the height of seven palm trees placed one upon another in the sky, and proclaimed that all things are produced from nothing. His awful words were echoed from all mountain peaks, from all trees and leaves, and from all herbs and bushes. He taught a prince, named Mahākaruṇachitti, the great Samādhi. The prince became a Tathāgata, Suvichintitārtha by name.

IX. One who seeks to attain the highest bliss, one who wishes to ferry all creatures over the troublesome sea of the world (bhavārṇava), should be practised in, and proclaim, the great Samādhi taught by all Buddhas, for it is the way to bliss for all of them, and explains the true idea of the quality of all creatures. One who seeks to attain the Samādhi should regard every substance as an illusion, a dream, a mirage. One who is convinced of the illusive character of things, i.e., one who is gambhīradhamakshāntikuśala, can never be led astray by temptations, by sins, and by fascinating charms of the external world, because he never regards them as entities. He is honest, unerring, unmoved by passions, and becomes indifferent to pleasure. He is said to be capable of intent attention to one object, to be free from illusions, clever, prosperous, blessed, of irreproachable character, and possessed of wisdom.

X. "Be wise," said the Lord to Chandraprabha, "for even the Sambodhi is not beyond the reach of a wise man, much less so is your Samādhi."

"I shall become wise," replied Chandraprabha, "I shall be regardless of life and health ; I shall learn from the Tathāgatas. I am determined to attain Bodhi knowledge, to destroy the evil genius Māra, to rescue millions from all suffering. Place, O Lord, your right hand on my head."

No sooner was the holy hand, impressed with all the signs of greatness, placed on Chandraprabha's head than all the hundreds and thousands and millions of Samādhis known presented themselves before him. Chandraprabha invited the Lord to his own house at Rājagṛīha, and gave him a grand entertainment.

XI. After the entertainment Chandraprabha presented the Lord with a rich robe valued at 990,000,000,000,000 pieces of gold, and distributed raiments to all the Bhikshus. All this time Chandraprabha was pondering over the most abstruse points of the Buddhist creed. He could not understand how the Bodhisattva could be non-cognisant of the phenomena of nature, &c.

The omniscient, aware of Chandraprabha's doubts from the very beginning, took the opportunity of explaining them, so that in a short time Chandraprabha was convinced.

XII. The Bodhisattva, who knows the nature of all phenomena, i. e., that they are only illusions, becomes an adept in recollecting past events, rises superior to the temptations of the senses, and becomes proof against the fascinations of Māra and his daughters.

XIII. The Bodhisattva who seeks for the relief of creatures from their pains should hear, receive, teach, promulgate, deliberate over, and spread the knowledge of the Samādhi, because it cures all maladies. Such a Bodhisattva is sure to attain the Sambodhi knowledge.

XIV. From the house of Chandraprabha the Lord returned to Gṛīdhra-kūṭa, and there graced a throne prepared for him by Maitreya, who, with its permission, had returned a little earlier. Chandraprabha came to honour the Lord with a train of 8,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 persons. He sat down, and in a humble manner asked the Lord, what were the necessary qualifications for receiving the Samādhi ? The Lord said, "they are four in number. The Bodhisattva who is learned and has a complete control over his passion as never to resent a wrong has the first qualification. One who is upright, modest, retiring, noted for the unswerving integrity of his character, and is lauded by Āryyas and wise men, has the second qualification. One who is contented, free from avarice, humble, fond of the three dhātus (jewels), who relieves the distressed, and eagerly thirsts for Sambodhi, has the third qualifications. One who is satisfied with his own condition, who has heard the scriptures, who is experienced in religious duties, to whom Dharma is the only guide, and who gladly imparts his knowledge to others, has the fourth qualification."

The Lord continued, "listen to me, Chandraprabha, long, long ago, there was a Tathāgata, Swarāṅgaghoshā by name. In the same kalpa he was preceded by Jñānasvara, Tejassvara, and Matīśvara, all of whom had practised this Samādhi. Long, long before the earliest of these, the world was blessed with the advent of Narendraghoshā. Standing in the sky he lectured on the great Samādhi. The earth shook under his awful voice. The king Śīribala renounced the world at the bidding of that lord, and he was followed by all his friends, relatives, ministers and subjects.

"After his death Śīribala was again born in the same family. His name then was Dṛiḍhabala. He still exists and knows my mission. He has published millions and tens of millions of aphorisms on the illusive character of substances. All Bodhisattvas still believe in those aphorisms. Now-a-days he sometimes lectures on that Samādhi which leads to the purity of speech, body, mind and sight, and which destroys the effects of human work. Sometimes he speaks of the Samādhi which leads to salvation, lit. the reflection of the eight membered passage अष्टाङ्गिकमार्गभावना, to the meditation of the subordinate parts of the communion with Tathāgatas, to truth, which produces keenness of intelligence, restoration of sight to the blind, to independence, to the knowledge of the evanescent character of the world" (lit. the interview or knowledge of illusion which has no beginning).

The Lord added that he had in one of his previous existences obtained the knowledge of the Samādhi from Buddha Dṛiḍhabala, and the events of his former existence he still remembered.

XV. Not to be puffed up with pride for one's own good works, to be indefatigable in the service of others, to have a large stock of knowledge, and to have unfailing presence of mind, are the qualities indispensable to one who aspires to the great Samādhi. One who has a mind to attain the knowledge can hear it at any time from any one.

XVI. A Bodhisattva who is not frightened at the hard conditions of the great Samādhi, becomes expert in enquiring into, in investigating and in ascertaining, the laws and religion of Buddha. He also receives emancipation according to the laws of that religion. On hearing these laudations, Chandraprabha became very anxious to practice the Samādhi, and obtained the permission of the Lord to do so. While he was engaged in deep meditation, the prince of the celestial choristers came down with five hundred musicians to sing hymns of praise in honour of the Lord. At the will of the Lord these gave out only Gāthās. In causing the production of these Gāthās the Lord had two objects in view, 1st, teaching the Gandharvas the proper notes of solemn music, and confirming by charming music Chandraprabha's noble resolution to practise the Samādhi. And the Lord succeeded in accomplishing both these objects. The Gāthās chanted on this occasion are named Achintya-buddha-darma-nidhyapti-gāthā or that which confirms the mind in the doctrines of the Buddhist religion, which is hard to comprehend.

XVII. In times long since past, king Indraketurvaja proclaimed the doctrine of a religion which trains the mind in benevolence, and in doing good to all creatures. One who prepares himself to accept the doctrines of that religion must be of spotless character, a friend to goodness, and an enquirer after truth. He should never be tired in honouring, serving, and doing good to Buddhas. If he fulfils all these conditions, he can easily obtain Samādhi knowledge.

XVIII. A Bodhisattva aspiring after the highest bliss should have a thorough grasp of the doctrines and teachings of the religion which showers its blessings on all. His character too should be irreproachable.

Two sons of a banker were induced to renounce the world by a Sugata. They lived in a lonely forest. The king of Jambudvīpa, when out on a hunting excursion, entered the forest, and became their disciple. Many thousands of his followers embraced the religion of their king. The king's brother, enraged at the defection from the good old religion of the Tīrthikas, ordered the hermits to be killed. In the next existence one of these hermits became Dīpaṅkara, and the Lord was the other brother. The king is Maitreya, and Devadatta the king's brother.

XIX. A Bodhisattva desirous of attaining the great Samādhi should be regardless of his life and health. Any attention paid to life is injurious to his spiritual welfare, for it breeds work.

In meditating on the form of a Tathāgata, he should not think of a material form, because a Tathāgata is composed purely of religion. The form of a Tathāgata is not produced, it is an effect without a cause, solemn, of immeasurable virtue, the cause of all things, immovable, baseless, resembling the sky, invisible, the eye of the universe, without a beginning, beyond the reach of thought, pertaining to the nature of the mind, unmoved by pleasure or pain, beyond the universe, without abode, full of love, self-controlled, impenetrable, infallible, and properly characterised by the word nihility. There is no other way of comprehending the form of a Tathāgata than the practise of the Samādhi.

XX. All the senses and their objects are the attributes of Tathāgata, i.e., they are the different manifestations of his qualities. Since the senses and their objects are infinite and inconceivable, the attributes of Tathāgata are also infinite and inconceivable.

All the feelings are the attributes of Tathāgata. Since these are infinite and incomprehensible, the attributes also are infinite and incomprehensible.

Similarly all the infinite perceptions, passions and impressions are the attributes of the lord.

The knowledge of the identity of all substances, qualities and actions with Tathāgata is called the knowledge of Dharma, or Dharma-samvit.

The earnest desire produced for the knowledge of Dharma is called the Nirukti-samvit.

The precepts taught by one who has the knowledge of Dhārma are called the Pratibhaṇa-samvit. There is another called Artha-samvit.

One who is desirous of acquiring the four Samvits given above, should practise the great Samādhi.

XXI. All Bodhisattvas should consider Tathāgata as nothing but an embodiment, Rūpa, (senses and their objects). He should consider Tathāgata as identical with the imperishable state of Rūpa, and he should believe in the thorough and complete identity of these two, Rūpa and Tathāgata.

Similarly he should believe firmly in the identity of the Tathāgata with feelings, perception, passions and impressions. So that he should believe that pentaform matter is nothing but the Tathāgata ledge of salvation, and should point out to them that merit, the root of all prosperity is the only means for the attainment of salvation. He should also explain to them what that merit consisted of. After doing these things, he becomes expert in the ways and means, and in a short time successfully accomplishes the Samādhi to which there is nothing superior.

XXIII. A Bodhisattva should learn to be vigilant, and to conduct himself so as to acquire watchfulness. One who is thoroughly well-versed in the six Pāramitās acquires these qualifications. The following ten qualifications are acquired by those who acquire the Pāramitā of Dāna or charity. (1) He subdues malice ; (2) acquires a self-sacrificing spirit ; (3) affords enjoyments to all ; (4) is born in a rich family ; (5) becomes large-hearted ; (6) an object of affection to men ; (7) the leader of the four assemblies ; (8) enjoys pleasure without being addicted to it ; (9) his hand and foot become soft ; (10) the sole of his foot becomes smooth.

XIV. Following are the ten qualifications acquired by a Bodhisattva who has acquired the second Pāramitā or Śīla, i.e., good conduct. (1) He completes his education ; (2) shapes his conduct according to the precepts of Buddha ; (3) is not an object of censure to the wise ; (4) never breaks his promise ; (5) cultivates knowledge ; (6) renounces the world ; (7) endeavours to attain nirvāṇa ; (8) (?) (9) acquires Samādhi ; (10) is never poor.

XXV. Following are the ten qualifications acquired by one who is well established in Kṣhānti. (1) He is not burnt by fire ; (2) not wounded by weapons ; (3) never drowned in water ; (4) not affected by poison ; (5) is protected by gods ; (6) obtains the thirty-two signs of greatness ; (7) is never overtaken by misfortune ; (8) has an easy access to Brahmaloḥa ; (9) lends a happy life ; (10) is always cheerful.

Then follow enumerations of the qualifications of Bodhisattvas who have acquired the Pāramitās of Virya, Dhyāna, Prajñā &c., strength, meditation, spiritual knowledge, scholarship, habit of teaching, the doctrine of Śūnyatā or emptiness of the world, Samādhi, and the habit of living in forests.

The Bodhisattva who has acquired true knowledge and has shaken off all connection with mundane qualities acquires the five experiences in addition to the tenfold qualifications aforesaid.

The five experiences are called nidhānas or treasures : (1) of Buddha ; (2) of Dharma ; (3) of Jñāna ; (4) of purvantāparānta pratyutpanna-jñāna ; the fifth is wanting. Seeing innumerable Buddhas is all directions is called the treasure of Buddha. Hearing the preaching of these Buddhas is called the treasure of Dharma. The acquirement of that knowledge is called the treasury of Jñāna by the virtue of which a Bodhisattva retains all moral precepts, teaches them to all creatures, and knows their real import. That experience by which thinkers obtain insight into the events, past present and future, is called purvan-tāparānta-pratyutpanna-jñānidhāna, (lit.) treasure of present, past and future.

XXVI. The Lord said, "Chandraprabha, you should learn to long for entering the hermitage, leaving your empire and all your wealth behind. Then you should learn to shake off all connection with the guṇas, to acquire Viveka and Kshānti, i.e., true knowledge and the mercies. You should hear of the great Samādhi, and sacrifice yourself for the benefit of others."

Some hundreds of kalpas ago, Dṛiḍhadanta, a king of Jambudvīpa, heard the great Samādhi from Tejogaṇarāja, a Buddha. He renounced the world and gave all that he had to the Sugata and to beggars.

XXVII. In this chapter are enumerated the fruits of hearing and of practising the great Samādhi.

XXVIII. In order that he may learn the nature of Dharma a Bodhisattva should listen to, practise, accept, teach and inculcate the great Samādhi. One who is convinced of the nihility of all qualities becomes the object of Sugata's affection.

XXIX. Not to perceive the purity of character, not to practice the Samādhi, not to inculcate knowledge, to scrutinize the doctrine of mukti, and to know as it is the doctrine of the soul's salvation is called Aparigraha or non-acceptance of all qualities.

The experience by which a Bodhisattva, after displaying the power of working miracle, inculcates all the moral precepts to all creatures is called Parikarma or decoration of the great experience. One who desires the acquirement of the Parikarma and the Aparigraha should listen to &c., the great Samādhi.

He only is Buddha who finds unity in the diversity of Dharma, inasmuch as in their character they are all Śūnya or empty.

XXX. A Bodhisattva, eagerly longing for the great Samādhi and for Bodhi knowledge, should believe in the doctrine of Śūnyatā or nihility, and should be careful in the worship of living or dead. Tathāgatas. A Bodhisattva longing for mukti should worship the Tathāgatas. He should with a sonorous voice and with a heart melting at the suffering of others, proclaim the great Samādhi, for it alone can fix the mind in the Śūnya, the cause of all qualities. When the Bodhisattva does this he is happy in salvation. In such an enviable position he perceives nothing. Deeply engaged in Praṇidhānas and in the Anupalambha Samādhi, he delights himself and others with meditations.

Innumerable kalpas ago, Ghoshadatta, saving the souls of millions, obtained the highest object of his wishes, viz., nirvāṇa. When king of Jambudvīpa he determined to worship the great Sugata in a manner worthy of such a great potentate. Kshemadatta, a Bodhisattva, in the presence of the multitude assembled at the royal palace, thrust his right hand into a blazing fire, first wrapping the hand with cloth saturated with oil. Unmoved by the excruciating pain the Bodhisattva began eloquently to preach the Samādhi.

XXXI. One who aspires after the great Samādhi and the Bodhi knowledge should act according to the following four moral injunctions. (1) He should distribute also for acquiring the knowledge of "easy means" from Tathāgatas who know it. (2) He should try to learn it from those that have the Bodhi knowledge. (3) He should be ready to sacrifice his own self for the good of those that love worldly enjoyments. (4) He should teach the knowledge of self to those that long for it.

Achintya-praṇidhāna-viśeṣa-samudgatarāja, a Tathāgata, was the teacher of a religion which prevailed for millions of years. At last, the Bhikshus, the guardians of his faith, became hopelessly corrupt. With one noble exception, all of them cared only for their own worldly interests. They all died of loathsome diseases. But that honest Bhikshu became the preceptor of Jñānabala, king of Jambudvīpa. In the course of time, an abscess formed on the Bhikshu's thigh. The disease was pronounced beyond the skill of medical men. Every one was sorry for the honest and faithful Bhikshu. The king and his family were in great distress at the prospect of losing their preceptor. It was then announced to the king in a dream that the only medicine which could cure the Bhikshu was human flesh and blood; the blood to be used as an ointment, and the flesh as diet. This the king caused to be proclaimed all over his wide empire. But no one could be found willing to offer his own flesh and blood to the holy man. At length Jñānavatī, the king's daughter, came forward, and cut out a portion of flesh from her own thigh for the use of the royal preceptor. But there was still a difficulty. The Bhikshu had scruples to take human flesh. So it was dressed privately, and served to him. He ate it unwillingly, and was cured.

XXXII. Ānanda asked the Lord why Bodhisattvas feel no pain even when their limbs are torn asunder. The Lord replied, as a worldly-minded man, every part of whose body is burning under the fire of sin, can feel pleasure without the fire being extinguished, he has no pleasure but in the pursuit of gain ; so does a Bodhisattva, who is desirous of escaping from the burning fires of grief, birth and decrepitude and longs to obtain nirvāṇa, feel no pain from such trifling matters as the amputation of a hand, or a foot.

The following story was cited in illustration of the preceding. At the time when Ratnapadma-chandra-viśuddhābhyudgatarāja obtained nirvāṇa, there lived a king named Suradatta, who reigned over the whole of Jambudvīpa. His capital was at Ratnavatī. He had eighty thousand wives, a thousand sons, and five hundred daughters. At that time, the false faith in mantras and sacrifice of the Tirthikas prevailed, The Bodhisattvas, under the leadership of their great preacher Pushpachandra withdrew to a forest named Samanta-khaṇḍa. (A leaf here is lost in the MS.).

Pushpachandra, by observing a fast of three days, converted millions to his faith. On the fourth day of his fasting he imparted Bodhi knowledge to millions at Ratnavatī. On the fifth day he brought the queens to his faith. On the sixth the princes were converted. On the seventh day he presented himself before the king, who was surrounded by his servants and the inmates of his seraglio. At the appearance of the Bodhisattva the king's followers fell prostrate at his feet. But other feelings were working in the king's mind. He was surprised to find a stranger honoured so much in his presence. The Bhikshu's comely person, his bewitching beauty, and his appearance before the inmates of the harem roused deep suspicion in the king, who, without any enquiry, ordered the Bhikshu to be killed by mutilation. His hands and feet were separated from his body, and his eyes were plucked out. A week later, the king happened to pass by the way where the murder had been committed. He found that putrefaction had not yet set in in the Bhikshu's corpse ; it looked as fresh as ever. The king then became aware of his own folly. He recognized in the Bhikshu some Tathāgata, and became the prey of remorse.

"One who desires the great Samādhi, Ānanda," added the Lord, "should preach the religion of Tathāgata even at the risk of his life."

XXXIII. When a Bodhisattva wishes to attain the excellent Bodhi knowledge he should listen to, practise, and preach, the great Samādhi.

XXXIV. In order to obtain the knowledge of Bodhi, a Bodhisattva should sow the seeds of prosperity.

Unnumbered ages ago, Gaṇeśvara was a great Jina, and Varapushpa a great king. The latter consecrated innumerable gardens to the honour of the Sugata. He used to distribute food to the followers at Gaṇeśvara. He fell in, one day, with the Tathāgata, and learned from him the great Samādhi. With five hundred of his sons he renounced the world, and practised the religion of Tathāgata. After the nirvāṇa of Gaṇeśvara, people returned to their old superstition ; but they were brought back to Buddha's religion by Yaśahprabha.

XXXV. "You should," said the Lord, "learn to restrain your body. By so doing a Bodhisattva learns to be indiffey to all doctrines, is endowed with the thirty-two great signs and eigho subsidiary indications of greatness,* acquires the ten supernatural powers of a Tathāgata, the four wisdoms, the eighteen Vaiṇīkas, the doctrine of Buddha, the three delights of the Moksha, the four Vihāras of Brahma the four Pratisaṇvids, the thirty-seven inferences of Bodhi, forgiveness, doubt and discrimination. By restraining the body, a Bodhisattva, shrinks with horror from slaughter, theft, incontinence, falsehood, malicious speech, harsh words, contradictions, incoherent speech, robbery, murder, false notions, error, vanity, dragging, confining, obstructing, beating, threatening, piercing, anger, and covetousness. His hands and feet cannot be separated from his body, and if they be separated, he never feels weakened thereby.

The three delights of Moksha are—the delight afforded by the knowledge of Nihility, the delight afforded by the knowledge that things are produced without a cause, and the delight that he has to perform no samādhis any more.

The four amusements (Vihāras), or those of friendliness (Maitrī) of sympathy, (Karuṇā) of delight, and of indifference.

For the four Pratisaṇvits, vide chapter XX, p. 213.

The thirty-seven inferences are the four associations (causes of memory), four destructions, four powers of working miracles, five senses, five powers, seven subordinates of Bodhi, and the eight ways to these.

Viśeshachailī, a king, obtained the knowledge of Kāyasaṇvara or the restraint of the body, from Jñānaprabha, a Tathāgata. Kāyasaṇvara is only the entrance to better and nobler conditions. The disciple must try to think that his body is as pure and brilliant as the sky, and then he should try to identify these two things, the sky and his body.

XXXVI. The next step to be taken by a Bodhisattva is to aim at the purity of physical actions, and at the restraints of speech (Vākṣaṇvara). The latter shows the inactivity of existence in Nihilism, the illusive nature of all things created, and that annihilation is the only truth.

XXXVII. The restraint of mind, Manah-saṁvara, shows that the mind is unreal like a dream, an illusion, a mirage. From it men become fearless, worship Buddha, and learn a samādhi named Jvālāntarābha.

XXXVIII. Explanations of the following technical terms :

The purity of action is aversion to the world which is merely an illusion.

Ārambhanasamatikrama, or abandoning of works, it is the giving up of all actions from the knowledge that they are unreal.

Skandhaparijñā, or indifference to the Skandhas, is related to the Skandhas produced by the knowledge of their unreality.

Ayatanāpakarṣha, or low estimate of the senses, is abandoning them from the conviction of their shadowy nature.

Anutpādaśākṣhātkriyā, or sight of things unborn, is the non-perception of the Dharmas.

Kriyāvatāra is not attempting the destruction of mundane pains arising from Vīrya.

Karmaphalābhipranāśa is the destruction of the consequences of works which are illusive like dreams.

Mārgabhāvanā is the perception of the way to salvation.

Tathāgata-samabodhana is the knowledge of the teaching of all the Buddhas.

XXIX to XLI wanting.

XLII. The Lord having discovered upon the innumerable benefits to be derived by the practice of the Great Samādhi, many millions of his hearers obtained the Bodhi knowledge, many resolved to obtain it, many longed to become Pratyeka Buddhas, and a change for the better was produced in all.

SAPTAKUMĀRIKĀ AVADĀNA alias AHORĀTRAVRATĀ
NUSĀNSĀ.

सप्तकुमारिकावदानं वा अहोरात्रव्रतानुशंसा ।

Lines on a page, 10. Extent in ślokas, 850. Character, Nāgarī.
Date, Sm. 1885=Śāka, 1750=Nepalese Era, 949. Appearance, fresh.
Verse. Generally correct.

Description of a fast called Ahorātravrata, in praise of which a story is told of seven Nāga damsels who had been cursed to be born as univalve shells, śambūka. The description was given to Aśoka by Upagupta, who said it had been before related by Śākya himself, who attributed it to Vasubandhu, a Jina, who had heard it from the ancient Buddha Vipāśyi. Vasubandhu taught the rite to Indrapriṣṭha, a king of Gandhavatī, in the Pūrvavideha country. Although called ahorātra or ephemeral, the fast extended actually to two days and two nights. The proper place for performing it is the neighbourhood of a sacred pool, a river, an ocean, a chaitya, or a temple. On the 13th of the waxing moon a temporary room or dharmasālā has to be erected, duly plastered with cow-dung, and decorated with four flags and an awning. On the floor of the room three diagrams of Dharmadhātu are to be traced with rice-meal of different colours and the night is to be passed in a fast. On the 14th at midday, the three jewels are to be worshipped with fivefold offerings and appropriate mantras; the worshipper to break his fast by partaking of simple food in the afternoon. At dusk the place and the Chaitya are to be illuminated and the worship repeated. On the 15th, or the fullmoon day the worship is to be again repeated and the day passed in rejoicing with music and singing.

King Indrapriṣṭha was the first to perform the fast. Having observed it he had the good fortune to rule his kingdom with great ease and splendour and then to enter the house of Jina. On this, Indra and other deities came to observe the ceremony of Ahorātravrata. In illustration of the merits of the fast, Upagupta relates the following story :

There was a large tank, named Chaitragarbha, in Magadha, where Gandharvas and Rishis used to perform the ceremony of Ahorātravrata. Eight* Nāga damsels went to them to see the performance. The Rishis fell down insensible by inhaling their poisonous breath. After a while, however, they regained their senses, and cursed the damsels by saying : "Ye shall be born as shells, (śambūkas) since you made us senseless by your poisonous breath." On hearing the imprecation the damsels propitiated the Rishis, who became sad at heart.

The curse, however was irrevocable and the damsels, turned into shells, lived in a pond. After a long while, a fisherman visited the pond, and cast his net into the water to catch fish, had instead of fish he got only eight univalve shells. He brought the shells home and gave them to his wife. The fisherman, having consumed all the eatables he had in his home, went out of the house. His wife, not having any other article of food at hand, had to live on these eight shells which she got boiled. The shells were all vivified in her womb. She became pregnant, and brought forth eight daughters in due time. When they grew up she sent them to market to sell fish.

One day, on the way, the eldest told to her sisters, "Sisters, on account of the great sin we committed in our former life, we have been

* The text has the word aṣṭa "eight," and gives the names of the eight in detail, but the name of the work is saptakumārī or seven damsels. In the absence of a second MS. to compare I cannot reconcile the inconsistency.

born in a low family ; if we commit the crime of killing animals, we shall have again to suffer." On this, they threw all the live fishes into the water, and purchased some dead fishes instead of them, and, having so d the latter gave the price to their mother. On another occasion, the fisherman's wife, having killed some live fishes sent her daughters to sell them. On the way, the sisters were surprised to see the dead fishes become alive, and threw them into the water. They then began to offer up their devotion to Buddha, whose temple was on the bank of the pond. Buddha, being propitiated, appeared before them, and through his grace they died on the seventh day after his appearance and took their birth as daughters to king Kṛika, of Benares. Their names then were :—The first, Vratī ; the second Dharmavati ; the third, Shubhamañjarī ; the fourth, Dhīmatī ; the fifth, Netramañjarī ; the sixth, Śrīmatī ; the seventh, Madanajahā ; and the eight, Vratamālā. Vratī, married to king Dharmadaksha, performed, in company of her husband, the ceremony of Ahorātravrata, and at last retired to the house of Jina.

ŚĀRDULAKARṆA AVADĀṆA

शार्दूलकर्णावदानं ।

Substance, paper, 10×4. Folia, 87 Lines on a page, 10. Character, Nāgara. Extent in ślokas, 1800. Date, SM. 1886. Appearance, decayed Prose. Incorrect

Story of Śārdūlakarṇa, in narrating which opportunity is taken to point out in detail the utter fatuity of relying on caste distinctions.

The scene of the story is laid at Śrāvastī. When the Lord was once sojourning there, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada, Ānanda, his favourite disciple, used daily to go to the city to collect alms. One day, after partaking of a repast in the residence of a householder, when he was returning to the hermitage, he felt thirsty. Seeing a girl, named Prakṛiti the daughter of a Chaṇḍālī, raising water from a well, he asked her for a drink, and was duly served. The girl was smitten by the appearance of the hermit, and as he could not be otherwise influenced, she besought her mother, who was proficient in charms and incantations, to bewitch him, by her art. The mother prepared with cowdung, in the middle of the courtyard of her house, an altar, lighted a fire therein, and threw into it, one by one, 108 arka flowers (Calotropis gigantea), repeating a mantra each time. Ānanda could not resist the force of this charm, and in the evening came to her house, and took his seat on the altar, while Prakṛiti, in delight, was engaged in preparing a bed for him. The conscience of Ānanda now smote him, and he began to cry, praying that the Lord may rescue him from his dangerous position. The Lord, perceiving by his miraculous power how his disciple was situated, recited a Buddha mantra, which immediately overpowered the incantations of the Chaṇḍālī, and Ānanda returned to the hermitage. The Lord, thereupon, taught him the potent mantra whereby he could always overcome such evils.

Matters, however, did not progress so satisfactorily as could be wished. The girl, disappointed at night rose early the next morning, put on her finest apparel and stood on the road by which Ānanda daily went to the city for alms. Ānanda came and she followed him to every house he went for alms. This caused a great scandal and Ānanda followed by the girl ran back to the hermitage and reported the occurrence to the Lord. The Lord was then called upon to exercise diplomacy to save the character of his disciple. He said to Prakṛiti "you want to marry Ānanda. Have you got the permission of your parents? Go and get their permission." This afforded but slight respite for Prakṛiti soon returned from the city with her parents' permission. The Lord then said, 'Should you wish to marry Ānanda, you must put on the same kind of ochre-coloured vestment which he uses.' She agreed and thereupon her head was shaved she was made to put on ochre-coloured cloth divested of her vicious motives and had all her former sins removed by the mantra called sarvadurgatiśodhana-dhāraṇī, the destroyer of all evils. Thus did the Lord convert her into a Bhikṣuṇī.

The conversion created a serious commotion. Rājā Prasenajit and the Brāhmaṇs and Kshatriyas of Śrāvastī were greatly scandalised by it and came to remonstrate with the Lord on his highly improper conduct. The Lord knew their object and explained the former history of Prakṛiti by reciting the following story :

In a forest on the banks of the Ganges there dwelt Triśaṅku, a Chaṇḍāla, who was the chief of ten thousands of his caste men. He had in a former tern of existence, studied the Vedas, the Itihāsa, the Śāstras and other branches of knowledge, and remembered them in his present life. He had a son named Śārdūlakarṇa, and to him he taught all that he remembered of his previous learning. The youth thereby became proficient in every accomplishment. Triśaṅku thought of a Brāhmaṇ, named Pushkarasārī, who had an only daughter thoroughly accomplished, and in every way worthy of his son. Next morning followed by a large retinue, he proceeded to the abode of this Brāhmaṇ and was well received, but when he made his request his host upbraided him for his presumption in asking the hand of a Brāhmaṇ girl for a Chaṇḍāla youth, and this led to a long discussion on caste distinctions.

Triśaṅku said : 'There is a marked distinction between ashes and gold, but there is nothing of the kind between a Brāhmaṇ and a person of another caste. A Brāhmaṇ is not produced like fire by the friction of dry wood ; he descends not from the sky, nor from the wind, nor does he arise, piercing the earth. The Brāhmaṇ is brought forth from the womb exactly in the same way as a Chaṇḍāla. When he dies he causes impurity exact,y as other castes do ; there is not the least difference in the case. Brāhmaṇs longing for flesh-meat, commit most cruel sacrifices. They say that goats and the like, by being sanctified by mantras go to heaven after slaughter. If this be the way to heaven why don't they send their fathers, mothers, sisters and the rest to heaven by the some expeditious way ? Brāhmaṇ, Kshatriya, Vaiśya and Śūdra are mere names, and imply no specific distinctions. All human beings have feet, thighs. nails, flesh, sides, and back exactly alike ; there is not the slightest difference in any respect and therefore there cannot be four different species. Even as boys playing on the highway take a quantity of dust and dividng it into different parts call one part water, another milk, another curds, another flesh-meat, another ghi and so on, but the dust does not thereby become any of those articles, so Brāhmaṇ &c are mere names and do not imply four distinct species. In animals like the cow, the horse and the like, there are marked differences in shape and thereby the cow. the horse and the rest constitute distinct species. In the same way mangoes, hog-plums (Spondias magnifera) rose-apples, dates and the rest belong to different species ; but there being no difference of shape in Brāhmaṇs, Kshatriyas, &c., there can be no difference of species. Devas become Brāhmaṇs, Kshatriyas Yakshas, Vaiśyas Nāgas, Śūdras Asuras. Had there been any truth in the doctrine of the Śruti that Brāhmaṇs produce Brāhmaṇs, and Vaiśyas Vaiśyas, there would certainly have been some specific marks. Moreover every member of the four castes can attain heaven by the merit of his own actions and there is no let or hindrance with reference to particular castes ; surely therefore there are no specific distinctions of castes. Among men those who plough paddy-fields, sow seeds and raise crops are called Kshatriyas. Those who giving up marriage retire to the wilderness built huts of leaves and there pass their days in contemplation are called Brāhmaṇs. Among Brāhmaṇs, those who go to the village and teach mantras are called Adhyāpakas. Those men who calculating upon profit undertake commercial transactions are called Vaiśyas. Those who earn their livelihood by petty works are called Śūdras. Those who feel disposed to conduct the work of chariots and elephants get the name of Mātāṅgas. Those who plough are called Karshakas. Those who trade are named Vanīks. Those who retire from home and accept asceticism are named Pravrajītas. Those who by their good conduct gratify people are called kings (Rājā). In none of these is there any specific organic distinction." By these and other arguments he silenced the Brāhmaṇ who thereupon asked him, "Do you know the Sāvitrī (Gāyatrī) ?"

Trīṣaṅku, said, "Yes I do, and also the origin of it. A long time ago a Rishi, named Vasu, married Kapilā, the daughter of a Nakshatras. By devotion to her he lost his vigour and to regain it he repeated the Sāvitrī "Bhur bhuvar yat savitur na kapilāyā bhargo devasya dhīmahi." The Sāvitrī of the Kshatriyas is : "Om ! jaṭilastā-paso-bhūtā gahanam vanamāśritā &c." That of the Vaiśya is "Om ! chittamāhī sahite vaiśya kanyakā &c." That of the Śūdra is "Om ! atapah sutapah jīvedaham varshaśatam paśyedaham śaradām śatam."

The Brāhmaṇ questioned Trīṣaṅku about the Nakshatras, their positions, stars &c., about the planets and many recondite questions about astrology and interpretations of omens ; to all which the interrogated gave very satisfactory replies. The Brāhmaṇ, thus overcome in every way at last gave away, notwithstanding the opposition of his disciples and pupils, his daughter to Śārdūlakarṇa.

"Now Bhikshus" said the Lord, "he who was Trīṣaṅku then is myself now. My son is Śārdūlakarṇa. This Ānanda, son of Sārada-vatī, is the Brāhmaṇ Pushkarasārī, and the daughter of that Brāhmaṇ is Prakṛiti, the Bhikṣuṇī.”

The work professes to be a part of the Divya Avadāna. It was translated into Chinese by Tchu-ja-hu, of the Western Tsin dynasty in 265 A.D. Its Chinese name is She-tau-keen-king. M. Burnouf has given an abstract of the story in his Introduction to Indian Buddhism, pp. 205f.

A collection of mantras said to have issued forth from between the eyebrows of the Lord when he was sojourning in the heaven of Indra, and was being worshipped by a large host of Devas and the merit of wearing them, reciting them, or hearing them recited. The mantras are of the type of the mystic Vija mantras of the Hindus.

A hymn in praise of Ārya Tārā. By Sarvajña Mitra. The goddess appears to hold the same position among the Buddhists as she does among the Hindus. The name of the work is due to that of the measure in which it is written ; the measure comprises twenty-one syllables to the foot, broken into three equal parts by two caesuras. The author was a Buddhist monk of Kāshmir. He was renowned for his unbounded charity. Having given away everything he possessed he proceeded to king Vajramukuta. In the way he met a poor Brāhmaṇ, who enquired of him the way to the home of Sarvajña Mitra. He said, "Have you not heard that he has given away everything he possessed and is now gone to the king ?" The Brāhmaṇ thereupon, heaved deep sighs in utter despair and shed tears. Sarvajña Mitra consoled him, by saying, "Never mind, come along with me, and I shall help you." Subsequently he sold his own person for its weight in gold to the king, and gave the proceeds to the Brāhmaṇ.

Descriptions of the Chaityasaṃvara and of the Srīṅgabherī rites. The descriptions were given to Aśoka by Upagupta, who said they had been first narrated by the Lord himself at the request of Śārīputra. The first rite consists in dedicating one or more model chaityas daily, till the number comes up to a hundred thousand. The models may be of cowdung, clay, sandstone, or metal according to the means of the dedicator. The direction for this rite had been originally given by Vipāśyī to a prince named Pradīpaketu. When the above rite is performed for a month from the 1st of Śrāvaṇa (July-August), with the accompaniment of the music from a golden horn and other musical instruments it is called Śrīṅgabherī.

The origin of the rite is thus described :—In the town of Śaśiprabhā there reigned a king named Siṃhaketu. His wife, Sulakṣaṇā, was greatly devoted to him, and frequently begged and prayed that he should abstain from hunting. The king did not listen to her advice and on his death, was born a buffalo. His wife was born in a Brāhmaṇ family, and, through her previous virtuous deeds, remembered the history of her former life. Knowing the buffalo, to be her husband, she followed him everywhere. Once she prayed to the Lord to retrieve her husband from his brutal condition, and the Lord advised, her what to do. One day the buffalo was destroyed and eaten up by some wild beasts, and a few bones and the horns were all that were left behind. The faithful wife cast the bones into the river, brought water in the horns to wash the spot where the buffalo had fallen, and, washing the spot, buried whatever fragments she found and the horns, and erected a chaitya over them with river sand. For thirty days successively she worshipped this chaitya with the utmost reverence and devotion. On the twenty-first day a crystal chaitya came down from heaven, and entered the sandy one. The place became surrounded by a moat and seven successive lines of ramparts. The horns were changed into gold. Within this crystal

A story in praise of the Vasudhārā rite. Suchandra, a man of great wealth and numerous progeny, was engaged in commerce, and some of his children held high offices under government. His youngest son was very vicious ; he lost his share of the patrimony by bad speculations in loans, and by the advice of a wicked man stole two bricks from a chaitya, and placed them at the entrance of his room. This was followed by fraternal feuds, loss of wealth, and total dispersion of the family. Suchandra wished to go and see the Lord, but he had nothing at home wherewith to buy fit offerings for him. His wife found a bit of iron chain at the mouth of a rat-hole. With this he bought a few flowers, and repaired to the Lord. The Lord, gratified by his devotion, directed him to perform the Vasudhārā rite, whereby he regained his former wealth and influence, and prospered in every way. The rite should be undertaken on the 3rd of the wane in the month of Bhādra, or of Māgha and repeated every month for a year. The rite consists in bathing in a river, putting on clean clothes, filling a pitcher with pure water over which the mantra of Vasudhārā has been repeated, placing the pitcher on kuśa grass spread on a pure spot, and then worshipping in the pot the goddess Vasudhārā. At the same time the mantra of Vasudhārā should be worn as an amulet on the person, and reverentially repeated many times and duly worshipped every morning, noon and evening. The charm begins with the words Om ! namo bhagavate vajradhare sāgaranirghosha tathāgate, &c.

Stories relating to an ancient Buddha named Vasubandhu.

CONTENTS : (I) When Lord Śākya Sīṅha sojourned on the crest of a hill named Kaṇakagiri, he was, one day, seen engaged in the performance of the Samādhi called Lokasandarśana or survey of the universe, and in course of it a flame issued forth from between his eyebrows. This flame enlightened twenty-eight thousand Buddhist sacred places, and the inhabitants of hell all came up to behold the wonder. Greatly surprised at this, Maitreya enquired of Mañjuśrī the cause of it. Mañjuśrī replied that in former times there lived a Tathāgata, named Varaprabha, who first performed this Samādhi, and after it he bestowed the perfect Bodhi knowledge to millions, and converted king Ajita and his eight sons, and seeing that Śākya now performed the same Samādhi, he too will expound the same religion. (II) After performing the Samādhi, Śākya invited Maitreya and related to him the story of a king named Indrapriṣṭha, who reigned at Gandhavatī, in the Uttara Videha country. This king once dreamed that Vasubandhu, a Bodhisattva, was seated on a throne in his court, and expounded the Buddha religion. Thereupon he invited that saint from the town of Vikrama, in the Vihāra country. (III) On the arrival of the saint, the king solicited of him the true means of salvation. The instruction given by the saint comprised mercy to creation, abstinence from theft, cruelty, concupiscence, &c. (IV) The king then enquired how it was that some people became rich, other poor ; some learned, others stupid ; some healthy, others diseased ; some went to heaven, others to hell ; and so forth. The saint replied that these were the results of former works. It was through the deserts of former works that beings were born as gods, mammals, birds and insects, and experienced the fruits of their own actions. Those who, through ignorance, fear, cupidity, or enmity, kill animals go to the hell called sañjīva, while those who kill wild animals by setting fire to forests repair to the burning hell called Tapana. (V) On the other hand those who, keeping the three jewels foremost before them, sow the seeds of virtue, never suffer from disease, decay, distress, and grief. The three jewels are the ever-felicitous, the undecaying, the all-pervading spiritual home of Jina. On the king enquiring how the three jewels could be kept foremost, the saint dilated on the merits of establishing Vihāras Chaityas, and consecrating therein the emblems of the jewels. (VI) He then dwelt upon the characteristics of the Saṅgha, and on the merit of employing well-born, well-behaved, well-disposed, intelligent youths to the service of the Saṅgha. (VII) The saint then repaired, along with the king, to Benares to establish Vihāras there. (VIII) The king invited Bodhisattvas and other saintly personages to be present at Benares on the occasion of his establishing Vihāras. (IX) The reception of the guests at Benares. (X) The feast given to them. (XI) On the merits of presenting particular articles to Tathāgatas. (XII) On prayers addressed by the king to the guests, and his return home.

Description of a transcendently pure and auspicious region called Sukhāvati. When the lord was at Grīdharakūṭa hill, near the town of Rajagṛīha, Ānanda asked the Lord for an account of the great Tathāgatas who had, in former ages, acquired the most perfect organs. The Lord in reply said, one of the earliest was Dipaṅkara, next to him Prataṭpavān, next Gandha, and next Lokeśvara. During the ministry of the last a Bhikshu, named Dharmākara, expressed a desire that of should be a Tathāgata in a region where life was long, where there was no hell, no suffering, no disease, no ignorance, and no evil of any kind. This prayer was fulfilled, he attained perfection, and lived in the region of Sukhāvati, where the presiding Buddha was Amitābha, so named because there was no limit to his effulgence. The region is full of gardens, flowers, singing birds, lakes and everything that could make up the beau-ideal of perfection in the estimation of the Buddhists.

This work was translated into Chinese by Hiouen Thsang of the Tang dynasty ; its Chinese name is Tching-tsan-seng-t'o-fo-shih-shau-king. Beal's Catalogue, p. 24.

SUMĀGADHĀ AVĀDANA.

सुमागधावदानम् ।

Substance, palm leaves, $12 \times 1\frac{3}{4}$ inches. Folia, 22. Lines on a page, 6. Extent in ślokas, 350. Character, Newāri. Date, ? Appearance, old. Prose. Incorrect.

Story of Sumāgadhā, daughter of Anāthapiṇḍada, a rich banker of Śrāvastī. The young lady had been given in marriage to Vṛishabhadatta, son of Suśīla, a banker and rich householder of Puṇḍravardhana. When dwelling with her husband, she was once asked if she knew of any great teacher in existence. She said, "Yes, I know the Lord Buddha, bright as the champaka flower, and of profound learning ; he is now dwelling in my father's garden, and is the greatest on earth." She then spoke in high praise of the saint. Vṛishabhadatta asked her, "Can you show him to me ?" Sumāgadhā replied, "Collect, sir, the materials for a good feast, and I shall show him to you."

She then repaired to the top of the house, drew a circle on the roof towards the side where the Lord was, and, respectfully offering a handful of flowers and a little water, said, "O thou most merciful, deign to favour me with thy presence."

Through the miraculous influence of the Lord, the flowers and the water rose high in mid-air, and like a flight of geese passed on westwards for six hundred and forty miles and fell at the feet of the Lord at the Jetavana garden. The Lord received them very graciously. On the following morning, along with Ajñātakaundīnya, Śāriputra, Maugha, Mahākāśyapa and others among his chief disciples, the Lord miraculously passed on through the sky, and appeared at midday before his devotee. Sumāgadhā worshipped him with every mark of respect and veneration, and entertained his retinue with lavish hospitality. The people of Puṇḍravardhana crowded round the Lord, and received benedictions and advice. One of the congregation asked how it was that the Lord was so merciful to Sumāgadhā ? and in reply the Lord said, this is not the only occasion when he had been so, he had been so before. In the 20th Kalpa, when men lived for a thousand years, Kāśyapa was the Buddha. He dwelt in the Deer Park at Benares. At that time Kṛiki was the reigning king, whose daughter was named Kāñchanamālā. The king dreamt some unpleasant dreams, and the expounders of dreams in his court recommended that the flesh of the most prized being on the earth should be given away in a feast to avert the consequences of the evil dreams. This implied Kāñchanamālā, who was the most beloved being in the kingdom, and the king could not listen to such a proposition. "Rather", said he, "that I should die immediately, or lose all my kingdom, than allow any evil to befall my dearest daughter." The king's grief brought the daughter to the place, and she advised that her father should abide by the advice of the Lord Kāśyapa. The king did so, taking Kāñchanamālā with him. Kāśyapa expounded the dreams, and assured him and his daughter that no evil would befall them.

The Bhikshus then enquired what was the cause of Kāñchanamālā's having been born with a chaplet of jewels on her head ? Thereupon the Lord said in a former life the lady, born as a poor woman, had respectfully offered an iron garland to the Chaitya of a Pratyeka Buddha, and through the merit thereof had been blessed to be born with a chaplet, and she who was the poor woman, was born as Kāñchanamālā, and was now born as Sumāgadhā.

A different version of this story occurs in the Avadāna-śataka, ante, p. 73.

सुवर्णप्रभासः ।

Substance, paper, $15\frac{1}{2} \times 3\frac{1}{2}$ inches. Folia, 84. Lines in each page 6. Date ? Extent in ślokas, 1,845. Character, Newāri. Appearance, old. Incorrect. Prose and verse.

The philosophy of Nihilism developed in the course of describing the merits of a certain mystic formula named Suvarṇa-prabhāsottama. The codex is incomplete, and comprises only the first twenty chapters, each of which is called a parivarta. The work was translated into the Chinese language by Dharmatatsin of the northern Liang dynasty (cirea, 502—505 A. D.), and published under the name of Kin-kwong-ming-king. The Chinese have also an abstract of this work in two volumes under the name of Kin-kwong-ming-wan-ku. (Beal's Tripiṭhaka, pp. 15 et 99.)

CONTENTS, I.—Once on a time the Lord was residing on the Gṛdhrakūṭa hill, when Lakshmī, Sarasvatī and other goddesses sat around him. Many Devas, Nāgas, Yakshas, and Rākshasas were also present. The Lord was contemplating on the essence of religion (धर्मधातु), which is perceptible only to the profoundest of Buddhas. Ānanda asked him as to what were the religious duties of Bodhisattva congregations. The Lord said, “whoever hears, preaches, sympathises with, or honours the great sūtra Suvarṇaprabhāsottama, obtains the substance of all Samādhi residing in the breasts of the purest of Bodhisattvas, and is followed and protected by the gods with great attention.” He then, by way of enumerating the benefits to be derived from the mantra, gave a summary of the work under notice.

II.—When the Lord was on the aforesaid hill, Ruchiraketu, a Bodhisattva, was at Rājagṛha. He had worshipped millions over millions of Buddhas. The germ of everything good was ingrained in his soul, and he had a thorough knowledge of all the doings of ancient Buddhas. All of a sudden a strange thought crossed his mind—“How is it,” thought he, “that Śākya Muni should live for eighty years only ?” Thus musing he was startled at the sudden transformation of his cell into a splendid drawing room studded with gorgeous gems of different colours. Four jewelled thrones were seen on the four sides of the room, with four great Buddhas seated on them. High on the eastern throne sat Akshobhya ; on the southern Ratnaketu ; on the western Amitāyuh ; and on the northern Dundubhiśvara. Other Tathāgatas, too, were there. The brilliancy of their persons illuminated the whole city of Rājagṛha, and extended even to the loftiest of the three thousand great regions. Now the sight of the blind was restored ; the deaf gained the power of hearing ; memory was restored to those that had lost the balance of their mind. Astonished at this transformation, Ruchiraketu, saluted his celestial guests, but still remained musing on the short span of Śākya Muni's life. The Buddhas, perceiving his anxiety, addressed him in the following manner, : "O thou of noble birth, do not think that there is any one under the sun, who can measure the length of Śākya Muni's live. We know of no such person. It is easier to count the individual drops which fill the ocean, than to measure the long period of his existence. No one can form an idea of the period of a Jina's life."

Then Devaputras of all conceivable forms, Yakshas, Nāgas, Gandharbas, and Brāhmaṇas, such as Kauṇḍilya and others, made their appearance in the assembly. They had heard the sound of Śkāya Muni's great Nirvāṇa. Kauṇḍilya fell at the Lord's feet, and asked him a boon. The Lord remained silent. Then a scion of the race of Litsa, Sarvasattvapriyadarshana by name, with a presence of mind miraculously obtained, answered for the Lord. He told Kauṇḍilya that he was authorised by the Lord to grant him any boon that may be asked. Kauṇḍilya asked for a very small fraction of the elements of which the Lord's body was composed, to the extent even of a mustard seed, in order that he might worship it when the Lord would be away, and, thereby obtain the lordship of heaven. He said he knew that the Suvarṇa-prabhāsa Sūtra would ensure that ; but it was extremely difficult even for the Śrāvakas and Pratyeka Buddhas to learn, it, and so there was no easy method of obtaining the sovereignty of heaven, except the worship of the lord's elements. The Litsakumāra replied to him in the following terms : "The smallest fraction of the Lord's elements, even to the extent of a mustard seed, would be recreated at a time when flowers of their own accord would cross the stream of the Ganges, when crows would grow red and cuckoos white, when the blackberry would grow to the size of a palm fruit, and date trees would bear the blossoms of mangoes." Ruchiraketu and the congregation were glad to perceive from this that the duration of Śākya Muni's life was immeasurable.

III.—Ruchiraketu dreamt a dream. He saw a kettle-drum made of gold, and bright as the sun, and assemblages of numberless Tathāgatas and a Brāhmaṇa sounding it. He heard the gāthā they were

IV.—The prayer of Ruchiraketu was as follows :

“Let the drum of Suvarṇa-prabhāsa scare away the mundane pains of all sorts from the three thousand regions ! May the people of this world be relieved from pains arising from vice, as well as those who dwell in the region of Yama ! May they also be relieved from penury ! ”

V.—The Lord related an anecdote to the family divinity (Kuladevatā), of Bodhisattvas. He said, there lived in former days a king named Bhujendra, who prayed all the Tathāgatas present, past and future, in the following manner : “I salute the Jinas ; I shall worship the Jina-saṅgha ; I shall worship the tranquil, the pacified, the pure, the great Muni, radiant with the lustre of gold.”

VI.—The Lord continued, “The principles of the absolute negation of existence have been explained at length in various Sūtras. They are, as a matter of policy, now published in an abridged form, so that all creature may learn how the body is nothing more than a deserted village. I now instruct you in the means of acquiring the knowledge of Nihility. The senses are like thieves in a battle-field. They know not each other, though they are in the same village. The sense of vision is running after form alone, that of audition after sound, that of smell after smell, of taste after taste, and of touch after touch. The fickle mind busies itself only with enjoyable objects. The mind, dwelling on the senses which are like thieves in a battle-field, is never after the deserted village. The human body to which the senses adhere is insentient—unsubstantial. It owes its origin to the residua of former perceptions. The material frame which creatures obtain in consequence of their doings in former existences is full of sputum, urine, faeces and worms. It is thrown away as a piece of wood at the end of life. Nonentity is the origin of everything. All animals and all the attributes of things have their origin in perception, through Avidyā or false notions. These attributes are sometimes existent, and sometimes non-existent. Therefore it is my opinion that these attributes are founded on deceptive perception. Rend asunder, O Bhikshus, with the sword of true knowledge, the feeling, the six senses, the form, the name, the knowledge and notion, and hold fast the attribute of Bodhi which is grand non-existence.”

VII.—The Lord explained in the course of his conversation with Vaiśravaṇa, Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Virūdhaka, and Virūpāksha, the four great Mahārājas, the merits of hearing, reading, and bearing on the person the great Sūtra Suvarṇa-prabhāsa.

VIII.—The goddess Sarasvatī, covering one of her shoulders with her outer garment, and placing her right knee on the ground, with folded hands asked the Lord's permission to wind up the net of illusions, spread round the chanter of the sūtra (Dharmmabhaṇaka), to grant him, the Dhāraṇī, and to show him the light of true knowledge: "I shall," said she, "restore the words or consonants, that may have dropped from the great Sūtra. I shall grant him the Dhāraṇī that his memory may not fail. I shall teach him the mode of holy bathing which will enable the great Sūtra to endure for a long time on earth, sowing the seeds of immense good, which will enable numberless creatures to cultivate their intellect, to learn various Sūtras, and to acquire immense merit." The ritual of the bathing is thus given. Orris root, yellow orpiment, Trigonella corniculata, Śirisha, and Accacia suma should be pounded when the Pushya asterism is on the ascendant, and a mystic formula is to be repeated a hundred times during the operation. Then a circle is to be drawn with cowdung, and the powder above described, with pearls, flowers and honey, is to be placed in it in a golden vessel. Four righteous men and girls with suitable decorations are to be employed on the spot. The fume of fragrant resins and the consort of five musical instruments are indispensable to the ceremony. The golden vessel is to be decorated with parasols, standards and flags. Its boundaries are to be set by the recitation of the mantra Ake nayane hili hili gile khile svāhā. Then the votary is to bathe, believing in the Lord, and chanting the following mantra : Sugate bigate Vigatāvati, &c. "When a reciter, or hearer, or a writer of the Suvarṇa-prabhāsa will have bathed in the aforesaid manner, I shall," said the goddess, "for his good remain with the Devas in the sky, and sweep away all sorts of diseases and distempers from his neighbourhood." So saying the goddess sat aside. The Lord praised her determination, and Kauṇḍilya extolled her good intentions.

IX.—Mahādevī saluted the lord, and said, "I shall also, my Lord, serve such a Bhikṣu. He shall be supplied with beds, cushions, vestments and alms-bowls. Those who will listen to the great Sūtra will remain in the enjoyment of terrestrial and celestial happiness for millions and millions of kalpas. Wherever Ratna-kusumaguṇasāgara-vaidūrya-kaṇaka giri-suvarṇa-kāñchana-prabhāsa-śrī, a Tathāgata, went, and wherever he cast his eyes, there all creatures obtained affluence at my hands. He shall be worshipped. I shall, by the power of the great mantra Suvarṇa-prabhāsa, increase the wealth of those that read it. Therefore those who desire wealth, should remember the following mantra—Pratipūrṇavare samantagata, &c. ; and prosperity will certainly present herself at the instant when in a vihāra, or a forest, cushions, aromatics, flowers, &c., are placed in the midst of a circle made of cowdung to his honour.

X.—Mantras for the adoration of Tathāgatas.

XI.—Dṛiḍhā, the presiding goddess of the earth, then offered to make the country prosperous in which the great mantra would be either known or preached. The Lord was very glad. He said "Any creature who would hear a line, nay a word, of the great mantra shall, after death, be born in the Trayastrīṣa and other celestial regions.

XII.—Saṅjaya, the commander-in-chief of the Yakshas, who had twenty-eight great leaders, under him, then offered to protect any one who would learn, or even hear one verse, nay one hemistich, of the great mantra Suvarṇa-prabhāsa. He offered not only to protect him, but also to make him prosperous.

XIII.—When the Lord was on the Gṛidhrakūṭa hill, Baladaketu asked his son Ruchiraketu, after he was anointed king, "do you know the science of government known as Devendrasamaya ?" Then, without waiting for reply, he proceeded, saying, "I learnt it from my father Varendra. Brahmendra first promulgated it on the mount Vajraprākāra. Those kings are partial incarnations of the thirty-three Devarājas who protect the good and punish the vicious, and thereby establish virtue and destroy sin. No king should overlook crime, as such conduct is certain to increase vice, produce fraud and dissension, and court invasions from foreign powers. No king should displease the gods, for when the gods are angry, epidemics, bereavements, and invasions are sure to follow. Kings should be impartial, for if they have a predilection for sin, many will follow their examples, cheating and fraud will increase, and the kings will be doomed to perdition. Therefore, my son, govern the kingdom according to the rules of the Devendra-samayārāja Dharma." The principles of good government are detailed at considerable length.

XIV.—Susambhava was a king when Ratnaśikha was the Lord of the earth. His capital was Jinendraghosha. Once he saw in a dream Ratnochchaya, a reciter of religion, reciting the great Sūtra.

He awoke, went in search of him, and found him repeating the great mantra in his house. The king heard it, and was purified.

XV.—Whenever a householder, or a woman of family, may be desirous of obtaining the knowledge of Buddhas, past, present and future, and of worshipping the Lord, he or she should hear and preach the great mantra Suvarṇa-prabhāsa.

XVI.—Bodhisattva-samuchchaya, a Kuladevatā, asked the Lord why the ten thousand Devaputras headed by Jvalanānanta were instructed by the Lord in the Bodhi knowledge immediately on their arrival at the monastery from the Trayastrīṃśa heaven ? Three of these obtained the knowledge of perfect Bodhi. In one of the innumerable past kalpas, a good man named Ruchiraketu flourished in the region named Suvarṇaprabhāsita, and there obtained perfect knowledge. Suvarṇaratnākarachchatrakūṭa and Suvarṇajambudhvaja-kāñchanābh flourished in succession in the region called Virajadhvaja. They preached and established the good religion in that region. After the demise of the last, a young man, named Rupyaketu, obtained the knowledge. But none of these Devaputras ever renounced the world, nor were they proficient in the six pāramitās, how was it then that they were able to acquire the knowledge ? The Lord said they were votaries of Suvarṇa-prabhāsa, and that was the secret of their success.

XVII.—In one of the innumerable past kalpas a Tathāgata, named Ratnaśikha, was born. After his demise, when the good religion was renounced by men, there was born a king, named Sureśvaraprabha. He had a banker named Jaṭindhara, a man well versed in the knowledge of the pulse and of all the branches of the science of medicine. He had a son named Jaṭavāhana, who was very handsome and accomplished. During the reign of the irreligious king Sureśvaraprabha his subjects were afflicted with various diseases. The only medical assistance procurable was from Jaṭindhara, who was extremely old, blind, and unable to move a step without support. Jalavāhana was deeply afflicted by the sufferings of these men. He learned the science of medicine from his father, and then cured his neighbours of their disorders.

XVIII.—Jalavāhana had two sons, Jalāmbara and Jalagarbha, by his only wife Jalāmbugarbhā. When he was passing in company with his sons by a tank inhabited by ten thousand fishes, it was on the point of being dried up. The presiding deity of the tank half discovering herself before the physician, implored his assistance to protect the lives of the fishes. Jalavāhana, finding no water in the vicinity, plucked leaves and branches, and threw them on the water, so that the small quantity of water in it may be protected from the scorching heat of the sun. He found at a great distance a river named Jalāgamā ; but he was sorely distressed for want of means to convey the water. At last he succeeded in procuring twenty elephants from the king Sureśvaraprabha. By the help of these elephants he filled the tank with water, and supplied the fishes with plenty of food. When the fishes were made all comfortable, Jalavāhana, standing knee deep in the water, offered a prayer to the Lord, and begged that whoever hears the Lord's name at the time of death may be born in the Trayas-triṃśa heaven. With this prayer he repeated the mantra—Namas-tasmai bhagavate ratna-śikhīṇe, &c. He then taught the fishes some of the most abstruse doctrines of the Buddhist religion, and returned home. The fishes died that very night, and were born in the afore-said heaven. Sureśvaraprabha, in one of his subsequent existences was Daṇḍapāṇi, Jaṭindhara was Śuddhodana, Jalāmbugarbhā was Gopā, Jalavāhana was the Lord himself, Jalāmbara and Jalagarbha were Rāhula and Ānanda. The ten thousand Devaputras with Jvala-nānanta for their chief, who were blessed with the Sambodhi knowledge, were the fishes that had heard the name of the Lord Ratnaśikhi from the Lord, and the divinity of the waters was the goddess Bodhi-sattva Samuchchayā, at whose request the Lord gave the above explanations.

XIX.—A Bodhisattva should sacrifice his own body for the good of others. The Lord in the course of his perambulation through the country of the Pāñchālas, entered a forest. He sat upon a grass plot, and struck the earth with the palms of his hands and the soles of his feet. Thereupon a great stūpa made of gold, rubies, sapphires and precious stones rose like an apparition. The Lord ordered Ānanda to open the doors of the stūpa. Ānanda opened them, and found bones covered over with jems. The Bhikshus honoured them with salutation at the command of the Lord, and then the Lord, at the request of Ānanda, gave the following history of the holy bones. "There lived formerly a king named Mahāratha. He had three sons, Mahāprāṇada, Mahādeva and Mahasattvavān. The king went to the forest. Rambling about his sons chanced to come to a secluded part of the forest. There they found a tigress who had by her side good looking cubs about seven or eight days old, but she looked sorely distressed for want of food, for she seemed to have had none since their birth. Mahādeva asked, "who is there that can sacrifice his ownself for this poor tigress, so famished, and in so much distress."

Mahāsattvān replied, "It is indeed difficult for us, self-seeking, narrow-minded mortals, to sacrifice ourselves for the good of others ; but to great minds who are bent upon doing good to others at any risk, it is a task of no great difficulty." So saying he thought within himself that a better opportunity for offering his body, so full of impurities, in the cause of others, might not arrive in the course of his life. So musing he bade adieu to his brothers, and offered his body to the tigress. His mind was full of hope. He thought he would obtain Bodhi knowledge, have sympathy for all, and prove the means of saving millions from dangers of the mundane life. The tigress recognised a great Bodhisattva in him, and did not touch his body. The Bodhisattva thought the tigress was too weak to kill him, and so, cutting his own throat with a piece of bamboo, fell before her. She despatched his flesh and blood almost in no time. The princes were surprised at the spirit of self-sacrifice that actuated their brother, and went admiring home to tell the mournful news to their father. The whole royal family was in mourning, and came to the spot where lay the earthly remains of the magnanimous soul. After loud lamentations, the king caused the bones to be buried in golden boxes, and raised a stūpa upon them.

"I am, O Ānanda, the prince Mahāsattvavān. I obtained by means of these bones the great Bodhi knowledge which nothing can equal."

XX.—Then a large number of Bodhisattvas, with folded hands, praised Suvarṇa-ratnākara-chhatraketu in the following words : "Thou hast, O Lord, sacrificed thy body which was more brilliant than gold. Thy limbs are shining gold. Thou art as it were a golden mountain." Then Ruchiraketu praised the Lord in the following terms : "Thou art the true one, O great Muni. Thou hast on thee the signs of a hundred merits. Thou hast a thousand beauties. Thou art adorned with various accomplishments, &c., &c."

XXI.—This chapter opens with an address by a Kuladevatā, but the concluding part of it is wanting.

SVAYAMBHŪ-PURĀṆA.

स्वयम्भूपुराणः ।

Substance, paper, 17×4½ inches. Folia, 163. Lines on each page, 8. Extent in ślokas, 5,055. Character, Newāri. Date, ? Apparently old. Verse. Incorrect.

A poetical account of the manifestation of Svayambhū or Ādi Buddha in Nepal, and of the origin of that country. The work belongs to the class called Vyākaraṇa or descriptive, and is written principally in the Anushtub metre, as Purāṇas usually are. There seem to exist, or to have existed, two recensions of the work, one an abridgment (laghu), and the other the full or elaborated one (vrīhat). The codex under notice contains the latter. It is divided into eight chapters, and extends to five thousand ślokas. Its author is Mañjuśrī, who lived in the early part of the 10th century. In every detail the work is a counterpart of the Hindu Māhātmyas, of which so many are affiliated to the Hindu Purāṇas, and, like them, is strictly local in character, being unknown beyond the limits of Nepal. According to Hodgson the work has the alternative name of Śambhu Purāṇa. It appears not to have been translated into the Chinese language.

CONTENTS : CHAPTER I.—The scene is laid in the Bodhimāṇḍapa at Buddha Gayā, and the principal interlocutors are the Bodhisattvas Jayaśrī and Jineśvarī. The latter, desirous of attaining the Bodhisamvara (a religious observance leading to Bodhi knowledge), asked the former as to the best means for its attainment. The former advises him to have recourse to the Poshadha ceremony,* which should be performed in a place of pilgrimage, in a Vihāra, in the temple of Sugata, in a chaitya, or in any place honoured with the image of a Buddha. "But the best place for its performance," says he, "is Svayambhū-kshetra, where the performance is invariably attended with the best results." Questioned about the origin of the place Jayaśrī relates what, he said, he had heard on the subject as related by Upagupta to Aśoka. According to this account this sacred place is situated on the crest of a hill called Gośṛiṅga. In the Satya Yuga it was called Padmagiri, on account of its have borne five lotuses made of jewels. In the Tretā age it was called Vajrakūṭa, because it was the abode of holiness. In the Dvāpāra epoch it was called Gośṛiṅga, because it had the appearance of a bull's horn. In the present Kali age it is called Gopuchchha, because it is long like a cow's tail. Svayambhū is kept concealed under stones, in order that bad men in this sinful age may not destroy the pure element of religion. A chaitya had been raised over the place where he lies hidden.

Once on a time Śākya Muni, after showing various miracles to all creatures at Jetavana, went to the mountain of Svayambhū. Devas, Gandharvas, Yaksha, etc. came to welcome him. They honoured him with profuse worship. He saw Svayambhū and the chaitya over it studded with gems, and having a golden wheel attached. Maitreya questioned him about the origin of Svayambhū. In reply, the Lord told him that he was, in the Bhadra Kalpa, when the life of men lasted for eighty thousand years, born as Satyadharma, the son of Bandhumān, the king of Bandhumatī. His mother obtained Buddhahood. He became a disciple of Vipāśyī, who used to live under a Pāṭalā tree. There was at that time a large square lake measuring 7 croshas, and named Kālīhrada. The author then gives a long account of the merits of this lake.

CHAPTER II.—After the emancipation of Lord Vipāśyī there was a king named Aruṇa, in the city of the same name. His son Śikhī obtained Buddhahood, and the Lord was his disciple under the name of Kshemarāja. It was at that time that a lotus was found to spring up in the Kālīhrada. It was as large as the wheel of a chariot. It had ten thousand golden petals. It had diamonds above, pearls below, and rubies in the middle. Its pollen consisted of jewels. Its seed-lobes were gold, and stalks lapis-lazuli. In its centre sat a crystal figure, one cubit high. That figure was Svayambhū.

III.—In answer to the question of Maitreya as to the period when Kālihrada dried up and became dry land, the Lord said, "After the Nirvāṇa of Lord Śikhī, when man's life extended to sixty thousand years, there was a celebrated king. His son Viśvabhū performed a great Samādhi under a Śāla tree. He obtained Bodhi knowledge. He had a disciple in Parvata, a celebrated king. Lord Viśvabhū, in company with Parvata and all his disciples, came to visit the shrine of Svayambhū. At this time there arrived Mañjudeva, the king of the mount Mañjuśrī in China, with two of his wives, Varadā and Mokshadā. The mount Mañjuśrī was anciently known as Pañchaśirsha, from its having had five peaks made of diamonds, sapphires, emeralds, rubies and lapis-lazuli respectively. Mañjudeva, finding the tank full of monstrous aquatic animals, and the temple of Svayambhū almost inaccessible, opened with his sword many of the valleys on the southern side of the lake. He opened the valleys of Kapotala, Gandhavatī, Mṛigasthali, Gokarṇa, Varaya, and Indrāvati in succession. The waters of the lake rushed through these openings, leaving dry land at the bottom. Mañjuśrī excavated a lake at the south of Gandhavatī, and the side of Kālihrada was made into a mountain by throwing mud on it. He then excavated on the top of the mountain a lake named Padmagiri. Its site is called Upachhanda, which is one of the ten most sacred Pīṭhas. It has a temple of the goddess Khagānā.

IV.—In the next kalpa, when man's life extended to four thousand years, after the Nirvāṇa of Lord Viśvabhū, a Brāhmaṇa, named Krakuchchhanda, was born in the city of Kshemāvati. He performed austerities on a grass plot under a śirisha tree (Acacia sirisa), and obtained Bodhi knowledge. The Lord was one of his disciples under the name of Jyotihpāla. Krakuchchhanda preached the good religion to all creatures. He remained for some time in Padmagiri, in Nepal, and then proceeded with all his disciples to the inaccessible peak of the śaṅkhagiri. In one of the largest of its caves he preached the good religion. He found that a number of Brāhmaṇas, with Guṇadhvaṇa for their chief, a number of Kshatriyas with Abhayandada for their chief and many Vaiśyas and Sūdras, eager to obtain the Bodhi knowledge. After their heads had been shaved and nails pared, he made them enter the Pravrayā. To them the Lord pointed out the rules of Poshadhavratā. The votary should every day implore the protection of the three jewels Buddhamaṇḍala, Dharmamaṇḍala, and Saṅghamaṇḍala. He should salute his spiritual guide, and honour the Buddhas in all the ten quarters. The acceptance of anything not given, conduct contrary to the rules of Brahmacharya, drinking, dancing, singing, flower wreaths, perfume, unguents, ornaments of gold and silver, high bedsteads, and untimely meals are forbidden to a Bhikshu when engaged in this rite. Incontinence is specially reprehensible. A Bhikshu who fails in the observance of these rules is doomed to perdition. If he succeeds in their observances, he obtains the five experiences, viz., divine vision, divine audition, the knowledge of other's thoughts, remembrance of previous existences, and the power of working miracles. Then he preached the thirty-seven virtues. These are, four causes of memory, four Samprahāṇakas, four points of miracle, five senses, five strengths, seven accessories to Bodhi, and eight secondary means.

The Lord then expounded the 27 virtues relating to Pukodhi. These are : 1st, The four causes of memory including the causes of the memory of matter, of feeling, of mind, and religion. 2nd, The four Samprahāṇakas, including the protection of merit already produced, production of new merits, destruction of prosperity, and the production of prosperity. 3rd, The four miraculous powers, including the superhuman power in meditation, in cogitation, in the settlement of points in dispute, and in strenuous exertion. 4th, The five senses including reverence, wisdom, concentration of mind, memory, and strenuous exertion. 5th, The strength including the power to emancipate, to protect, to meditate, to pardon, and to know. 6th, The seven accessories to Bodhi, including memory, accumulation of merit, love, exertion, purity, concentration, and resignation. 7th, The eight secondary means including perfect vision, perfect resolution, perfect speech, perfect work, perfect living, perfect exercise, perfect memory, and perfect concentration. A Bhikshu should abstain from the following ten vicious acts ; viz., killing animals, accepting things not given, deception, wilful misrepresentation, wickedness, cruelty, prevarication, spiritual ignorance, mischievous intention, and false vision.

The Lord Krakuchchhanda spoke in high terms of the river Vāgmatī which is as holy as the Gaṅgā, and which was produced from certain drops of waters which fell from the fingers of Tathāgata by the superhuman power of Vajrasattva. Then Vajrasattva, by the order of the Lord, threw half the quantity of the hair and parings of nails of the Bhikshus who had been ordained there, on the top of the mountain Śaṅkha, and lo, there came into existence a river named Keśavatī, emersion in the water of which washes away all sorts of sins arising out of anger, envy and folly. The other half of the hair and parings of nails were thrown on the top of the amount Śaṅkha, and it remained there and looked like a large number of chaityas.

After the departure of the Lord Krakuchchhanda from Nepal, Svayambhū produced eight of Vitarāgas, or holy men who had mastered their passions. They exist there, and grant happiness and prosperity to all creatures. These are, (1) Maṇilīṅgeśvara, who grants increase of longevity to men. He lives in the vicinity of the valley on the river Maṇichūdā. This river was anciently Rohiṇī. It derives its present name from Lord Maṇichūdā's granting the jewel from his head to his suitors, on its banks. (2) Gokarṇeśvara, in Gokarṇa on the Vāgmātī, where it falls from the mountain ; he grants increase of fame. (3) Kīteśvara, on the crest of the mountain Chāru in the vicinity of Svelahrada ; he grants increase of merit. (4) Kumbheśvara, in Kumbhatīrtha ; he grants increase of knowledge. (5) Phaṇigartteśvara, in Phaṇigartta on the Godavari ; he grants increase of happiness. (6) Phaṇilīṅgeśvara, in Joytīrlīṅga ; he grants increase of fame in the valley of Phaṇiśītā. (7) Gaudheśvara, on the peak of Gandhavatī ; he grants increase of wealth. (8) Vikrameśvara, near the river Vikramasthalā ; he grants increase of progeny. Thus, by the power of Svayambhū and Mañjudeva, villages, cities and capitals were founded from the crest of the mount of Śaṅkha down to the Chintāmaṇitīrtha. The country has a rectangular shape. It is bounded on the north, by the Vāgmātī, on the east by the Keśavatī, on the south by the mountain Śaṅkha, and on the west by Rājamañjarī. Dharmakara, a king of China, was anointed its king, and he governed it wisely as his own kingdom.

V.—The Lord gave the following enumeration of the holy places for ablution in, or near, the Vāgmātī river, detailing the meritorious consequences of bathing in them. (1) In the Vāgmātī there is a serpent named Raktāṅga. (2) At the confluence of the Vāgmātī with the Māradāraka is Śānta-tīrtha, which cures diseases. (3) At its confluence with the Maṇirohiṇī is Śaṅkara-tīrtha, emersion in which brings health and peace. (4) At its confluence with the Rājamañjarī is Rājatīrtha, emersion in which gives health and regal power. (5) At the confluence of the Keśavatī with the Vimalāvati is Manorama-tīrtha ; and the serpent Karburakuliśa of that place grants clothes, &c. (6) At the confluence of the Keśavatī with Bhadrā is Nirmala-tīrtha, and the serpent Upanālaka of the place is the destroyer of sin. (7) At the confluence of the Keśavatī with the Svarṇavatī is Nidhānaka ; the serpent Nanda and Upananda of which place grants wealth and corn. (8) At the confluence of Keśavati with Pāpanāsinī is Jñāna-tīrtha ; the serpent Śvetasubhranāga of that place is the giver of happiness. (9) The confluence of the Keśavati and the Vāgmātī is known as the Chintāmaṇi-tīrtha, and the serpent Vāruṇa of that place fulfils all human desires. (10) The confluence of the Vāgmātī with the Ratnavati is known as the Ramodaka-tīrtha. The serpent Padma of that place grants love and enjoyment. (11) The confluence of the Vāgmātī with the Chārumātī is known as Sulakṣhaṇa-tīrtha. The serpent Padma of this place is the granter of fortune. The confluence of the Vāgmātī with the Prabhāvatī is known as Jaya-tīrtha, which grants wealth and beauty and destroys enemies.

Then the Lord proceeded to give the names of twelve other places of pilgrimage of a secondary character. They are resorted to on particular conjunctions (yogas). These are, (1) Anālīṅga ; (2) Maṇiśīlā ; (3) Gotrāvalī ; (4) Nadikrikanṭha ; (5) Mātā ; (6) Machchhamukha ; (7) Hlāti ; (8) Navālīṅga ; (9) Kākeśvara ; (10) Techāpa ; (11) Vāgiśvara ; (12) The merits of bathing in these tīrthas are the same as those of the pools mentioned before. There are other holy bathing places. For instance the cataract of the Vāgmātī named Darī. There is a she-serpent named Sundarī at Darī who fulfils all desires. On particular conjunctions the worship of Agastya, after bathing in the lake of the same name, conduces to the welfare of men. The worship of Ananta, on certain conjunctions like the Kumbha Saṅkrānti, after the emersion in the lake Ananta, adds to wealth. The worship of Tārā, after bathing in the lake Tārā on the day of Vṛisha Saṅkrānti, fulfils human desires. The worship of Avalokiteśvara after emersion in the river Kapotari, which takes its rise from the opening of Kālīhrada, saves human souls from perdition. The ten lords of the ten quarters, Brahmā, Kṛiṣṇa with Rādhikā and other milkmaids went on pilgrimage to these tīrthas.

VI.—Maitreya asked the Lord why was Svayambhū called Vāgiśvara, and how the place became the abode of Devās and holy places ? The Lord said, "In ancient times in the Bhadra Kalpa, when man's life extended to thirty thousand years, Kaṇaka, the son of the priest of the king of Sobhāvatī, obtained Buddhahood under a Dumbīlya tree, under the name of Sudharmarāja. I was then a disciple of Kaṇaka. Lord Kaṇaka went with all his disciples to Nepal on pilgrimage to Svayambhū. Just at this time, a Bhikshu, named Dharmaśrimitra, came to Nepal with a view to proceed to China to learn from Mañjudeva the explanation of the Nāmasaṅgīti and the meaning of the twelve letters. In his northward journey from the temple of Svayambhū he chanced to meet a cultivator driving his plough drawn by a tiger and a lion. The farmer welcomed him, requested him to halt with him for a night, and then to proceed to China which was, he said, a year's journey from the place. Then he caused the tiger and the lion to disappear in order to produce in the stranger's mind the impression that the land was ploughed by gods. This piece of ground so ploughed is called Jñāna-bhūmi. Dharmaśrimitra had come to the mount Mañjuśrī, the Nepalese residence of Mañjudeva, where in the morning he discovered his host to be no less a person than Mañjudeva himself. The wonder of the Bhikshu knew no bounds. Mañjudeva, as a preliminary to his obtaining the explanation, made him perform the ceremony of Abhisheka in the following manner: The essence of Svayambhū was a circle. A circle was drawn with a radius of either one or ten or a thousand cubits measuring two spans each. It was decorated with right squares of various colours. It had many openings. The Bhikshu sat at the centre of the circle, and performed worship, contemplating in his mind the picture of Mañjudeva with his wives. After the ceremony was over, Mañjudeva instructed him in the explanation of the Nāmasaṅgīti, and initiated him in the mysteries of the twelve letters. The twelve letters are compounds of अ, ā and ई ī. By means of these letters all languages, all śāstras, and even the Vedas are produced."

VII.—Why was Svayambhū concealed under stones, and who raised the chaitya for Svayambhū? In answer to these questions the Lord gave the following explanation: "In that very Bhadra Kalpa when man's life extended to twenty thousand years, Kāśyapa, the son of a learned Brāhmaṇa of Vārāṇasī, obtained Buddhahood under a pipal (Nyagrodha) tree. From Lord Kāśyapa the city of Vārāṇasī is called Kāśī. I was then, under the name of Jyotirāja, a disciple of Kāśyapa. Lord Kāśyapa went to Nepal to worship Svayambhū. Thence he went to Sumeru, where he was greatly honoured by Indra and other gods and goddesses. From Sumeru his journey was extended to Trayastriṅśa, where he preached the good religion to his mother, and he ultimately chose it for his residence. Mañjudeva, in company with his wives, who may be compared to Keśinī and Upakeśinī, desirous of keeping constant company with the Lord, left his material frame behind, and in a celestial form proceeded to Trayastrīṅśa. The place where his ashes fell is known as Patachchaitya or the Falling Temple. Devas and Asuras, who were on the mount Puchchāgra, called it Puchchāgra chaitya.

In the walled city of Gauḍa which had only one gate, Viravati was the presiding diety. Prachāṇḍadeva, the king of Gauḍa, having abdicated his throne in favour of his son Śaktideva, devoted himself for a long time to the service of the goddess Viravati. The fame of Svayambhū Kshetra as a holy place reached him there. He at once directed his steps towards the place. He renounced the world, and became a Bhikshu, under the name of Śāntikara. A short time before this, Vajrasattva, fearing that wicked men in the Kaliyuga, would steal away the jewels of Svayambhū and destroy his image, concealed him under a slab of stone. Śāntikara saw Svayambhū lying concealed. He placed a large piece of precious stone upon it, which Vajrasattva perforated in thirteen different places, so that any offerings in gold and silver may fall on Svayambhū's head, like so many flowers. Viśvakarmā, at the request of the Śāntikara, built a chaitya upon it. A chaitya was also raised on the remains of Mañjudeva on the mount Puchchāgra. The residence of Mañjudeva was also honoured with a similar chaitya. Śāntikara consecrated all these chaityas. He also built five temples. (1) In the first of these he placed the image of Mahāvira, the giver of peace and final beautitude. This temple, facing the east, and extending from north to south, had only one entrance, and was divided into five apartments. (2) The second temple was situated to the south-east of the temple of Svayambhū. It was called Vasupurī, and was dedicated to Vasundharā, the giver of plenty. (3) To the south-west of Svayambhū was the temple of Vāyupurī, dedicated to Vāyu, animal sacrifice to whom frees one from transmigration into a bird's life. (4) The fourth was the temple of Agnipurī, sacred to Agni, by offering flesh and wine to whom one escapes from fire. The fifth temple was Nāgapurī, consecrated to Varuṇa and other Nāgas, by offering the five productions of a cow (Panchagavya) to whom a man attains peace and health, and gets copious rain. Śāntikara placed the images of the following gods all round the place. On the south of Śāntipura he placed Prithubhairava; to the east of Svayambhū Abhairavabali; a short way down the hill to the east, Tejobhairava; to the south-west of the mountain, Vāyubhairava; to the west of the mountain, Khabhairaya; to the east; Śūnyabhairava; to the west of Svayambhū, Hāritidevī facing the east ; to the east of the mountain Ekanāga, in the centre Kālināga. Two Ganeśas were placed in the forest region on the mountain, one facing the south, the other facing the west. Beyond these, at the foot of the mountain, were placed four circles (Maṇḍalas—Buddhist railings ?).

VIII.—There was a continuous drought for seven years in Nepal. The drought brought on a famine. The people were dying of starvation. At the request of the king Guṇakāma, Śāntikara undertook to allay the famine. He drew the figures of a lotus with eight petals, and invoked the Nāgas. They came. In the centre of the lotus sat Varuṇa, of a white colour with two hands and seven hoods. On the eastern petal came the blue coloured Ananta ; on the southern petal, Padmaka of the colour of a lotus stalk, with five hoods ; on the western petal, the saffron coloured Takshaka, with nine hoods ; on the northern Vāsukī, green, with seven hoods ; on the south-west Śaṅkha, green ; on the north-west Kullka, white, with thirty hoods ; on the north-east the gold-coloured Mahāpadma with as many hoods. But the blue coloured Karkaṭa, who was to have sat on the south-eastern petal, did not come. At the command of Śāntikara king Guṇakāma brought him, against his will, from his retreat in the Lake Ādhāra to the south of the Gandhavatī, by main force. Śāntikara worshipped these Nāgas, and they sent a copious shower. Śāntikara, with the blood extracted from the bodies of serpents, painted the figures of these Nāgas as seated on a lotus, and placed the picture in a city, named Nāgapura, founded on the occasion, and consecrated it. The worship of the Nāgas in this form was declared to be an antidote to famine and droughts. The Nāgas were then dismissed, and Nepal was blessed with copious rain and plenty. Guṇakāma, in his old age, abdicated his throne in favour of his son Narendra, and renounced the world. By constantly worshipping Svyambhū and Śāntikara he obtained, after death, the blessed region named Sukhāvati. Śāntikara performed a meritorious Samādhi named Āsphālana, and, excavating a large cave, a Yojana in extent, to the east of Śāntipura, remained there, like Gayaśirsha, having in his left hand the jewel named Chintāmaṇi, the giver of food and clothing at the holder's desire, and in his right hand the waterpot named Chintāmaṇi, having a tree of the same name behind him. The cave was known as Guṇagartta. It is a holy place ; it grants wealth and prosperity ; and one is sure to obtain success and attain final beatitude by repeating sacred mantras here. It is still the belief in the neighbourhood that Śāntikara rose again from his meditation as Varjasattva, and preached the religion on which alone can grant final beatitude.

The Lord gave the following account of the future condition of Nepal : "There will arise in the east, on the north-east of Kāleśvara, on the trunk of Champaka tree, a golden Lokeśvara, named Harivāhana, facing the west. Brāhmaṇas and others will worship him under the name of Nārāyaṇa. Long after this, there will arise on the Vāgmatī, in the valley of Mugasthata, a Lokeśvara, the subduer of the three regions, facing the south surrounded by Hari, Hara, Hiraṇyagarbha and others. Him the people will worship under the name of Paśupati. Long after that, during the region of Yakshamalla, there will arise a Lokanātha in the place of Yamaleśvara. For in the future there will arise on the Gandhavatī, to the south of Gandheśvara, a red coloured Lokeśvara, named Khasarpa, facing the north. Later than that, during the reign of Narendradeva, there will be a continuous drought extending over a period of twelve years. Narendradeva will worship the Lokeśvaras by the advice of Bandhudatta. He will bring Lokeśvara from the mount Kalpa, and perform the ceremony of drawing the car. When the Śaiva religion will be introduced in Nepal there will be a famine. The names here given clearly show that the Purāṇa is not more than four or five hundred years old.

Mr. Hodgson has given a connected and interesting narrative taken from the Svayambhū Purāṇa, of the origin of Nepal in his 'Essays,' pp. 115. But the standpoint from which he surveyed his subject was different from mine, and his version contains several short extracts which I have omitted.

One hundred and eight epithets strung together in the form of a hymn in praise of a goddess named Ekajaṭā Ārya Tārā or simply Tārā, who is the counterpart of the Hindu goddess of the same name. The hymn is alleged to have been imparted by Āvalokita Bodhisattva to Vajrapāṇi Bodhisattva, and is intended to be worn as an amulet to avert evils proceeding from thieves, war, fire, lions, water, elephants, tigers, noxious animals generally, and other causes. Bhikshus were much exposed to these in their peregrinations, and Vajrapāṇi wanted a ready means of overcoming them. It is obviously an imitation of Hindu hymns of the kind, of which there are a great many extant. The Hindus usually prefer 108 to 100 epithets. The Muhammadans have also several hymns of the same kind. They call them in Arabic أَلَسْمَاءُ or “the most comely names of God.” The number of epithets employed by them is 33, 99, or 990, according to the number of beads in their rosary. The usual number is 99.

TATHĀGATA-GUHYAKA alias GUHYA-SAMAGHA.

Substance, paper, 12×3 inches. Folia, 118. Lines on each page, 5. Extent in ślokas, 1,100. Character, Newārī. Date, N. S. 919. Appearance, old. Prose. Corrupt.

A ritualistic work belonging to the class Tantra, and treating of various esoteric rites and mantras, dwelling largely on the peculiar marks that are characteristic of the body of a Tathāgata, and on various forms of meditation. It is written partly in Gāthā verse, and partly in Sanskrit prose, and is divided into eighteen chapters.

As a Tāntric composition of the esoteric kind, it has all the characteristics of the worst specimens of Śākta works of that type. The professed object, in either case, is devotion of the highest kind—absolute and unconditional—at the sacrifice of all wordly attachments, wishes and aspirations ; but in working it out theories are indulged in and practices enjoined which are at once the most revolting and horrible that human depravity could think of, and compared to which the worst specimens of Holiwell Street literature of the last century would appear absolutely pure. A shroud of mystery alone serves to prevent their true characters being seen, but divested of it works of the description would deserve to be burnt by the common hangman. Looking at them philosophically the great wonder is that even a system of religion so pure and so lofty in its aspirations as Buddhism could be made to ally itself with such pestilent dogmas and practices. The chapters of the work are, as is usually the case with the Tantras, called Paṭalas, and the similitude is carried out in every respect. The first chapter opens with details about various kinds of Samādhī or meditation appropriate for the higher order of the Buddhist clergy. The second gives directions as to the mode in which Buddha is to be reflected upon. The third and the fourth describe various kinds of diagrams and mystical figures necessary to be drawn when engaged in the worship of Buddha. In the fifth are detailed the characteristics and qualifications necessary for a neophyte to undertake certain forms of secret worship, and among the practices enjoined which promote the attainment of perfection, debauchery of the most bestial character, not even excepting mothers, sisters and daughters, is reckoned as most essential.* These are followed by an account of how, during the height of meditation in the case of perfect devotees, the crown of their head bursts open, and rays of light issue therefrom. Certain prayers to be addressed by Bodhisattvas to Bhagavān are also given.

The sixth is devoted to secret mantras, like the Vija mantras of the Tantras, to meditation of mystic diagrams, and to training necessary for such meditation. The most appropriate food for devotees while engaged in this worship is said to be the flesh of elephants, horses and dogs,† to the exclusion of rice. The means of attaining perfection, described in the next chapter, are not to be austerity, privations and painful rigorous observances, but the enjoyment of all the pleasures of the world,‡ and the way in which some of the pleasures are described is simply revolting. §

The eighth opens with a hymn, by Ratnaketu, in praise of Bhagavān, and then gives the ritual of the worship aforesaid. The ninth is devoted to the ritual of the worship of Vajradhara, the diagrams, the forms of meditation, and the secret mantras required for the same. The tenth is a dialogue between Tathāgata and Vajradhara, in course of which the latter explains the details of adoration with a secret mantra called Mahā-siddhi-pradāyaka-mantra, or that which grants the highest transcendental powers. In the next, Tathāgata explains the mystery of the sacred syllables om, āh, hum, and the uses thereof. This is followed, in the next chapter, by instructions as to the rituals to be observed in performing particular kinds of meditations and the rewards derivable therefrom. All castes and classes are declared to be fit for the performances of such meditations, provided they follow the rules. The subject is continued in the next in which japa or silent recitations of mantras of various kinds are enjoined. These recitations may be accomplished by the body (kāyajāpa), by speech (vāgjāpa), by the mind (chittajāpa), by the passions (rāgjāpa), and by other means.

The fifteenth section is particularly disgusting in its details, as it describes the adoration of Buddha through damsels of twelve years of age, daughters of Chañḍālas, dancing women and other low castes, and by observances of rituals of the most revolting kind. Daily intercourse with daughters of the Chañḍāla caste in out of the way places is deemed an essential of the highest importance,* and particular stress is laid on their personal charms.† A variety of mantras are given for the purpose of these adorations, and also incantations and charms for curing diseases, for causing hallucination or death, for acquiring superhuman powers, and for other purposes. The mantras are of the usual type, formed of the mystic syllables, om, hum, hah, ah, &c. One of these include twenty-three such syllables.

The sixteenth is exclusively ritualistic, giving directions for various kinds of secret worship, and the most appropriate diagrams, mantras, homas, and offerings of various kinds required for them. The oblations to be offered on the homa fire include, among other things, ordure, flesh, oil, &c.‡ The ceremonials described are throughout in the highest degree mystical.

The next two sections are quite as mystical and revolting as the last, but they are not so entirely ritualistic. They are made up of a great number of dialogues between Bhagavān, Vajradhara, Vajrapāṇi, and other Bodhisattvas, in which the esoteric doctrines of the faith are discussed at length, and various duties, discipline, forms, observances, rituals and practices are inculcated. All the ritualistic forms of dhyāna, dhāraṇā, mudrā, nyāsa, sādhana, &c., of reflection, meditation, gesticulation, regulation of breath, and other manifestations of mummerly which characterize the Tāntric cult of the Hindus are all faithfully reproduced, and interspersed with hymns, prayers, hallelujahs, &c. Some of these are in themselves of perfectly unexceptionable character. Others, absurd, unmeaning, or stupid as they are, are not in themselves such as to be particularly objectionable. But they are sometimes disfigured by injunctions which are highly repulsive. Not satisfied with the order given in the last chapter to make offerings of excrementitious matter on the homa fire, the author goes to the length of recommending such substance as human food,* denouncing all repugnance to such articles as sinful,† and enjoining that no food or drink should be taken by a worshipper, which has not been mixed with ordure, or urine, or flesh-meat of some kind.‡ Such injunctions would, doubtless, be best treated as the ravings of madmen. Seeing, however, that the work in which they occur is reckoned to be the sacred scripture of millions of intelligent human beings, and their counterparts exist in almost the same words in Tantras which are held equally sacred by men who are by no means wanting in intellectual faculties of a high order, we can only deplore the weakness of human understanding which yields to such delusion in the name of religion, and the villainy of the priesthood which so successfully inculcates them. No wonder the work was long kept away from Mr. Hodgson on the allegation that it was not available in Nepal, though he at last got it. (Essays, p. 49.)

उपोषधावदानम् ।

Substance, Nepalese paper, $12 \times 3\frac{1}{2}$ inches. Folia, 37. Lines on a page, 5. Extent in ślokaś, 400. Character, Newārī. Date, ? Appearance, old. Prose and verse. Very incorrect.

An account of an optional fast called Uposhadha or Poshadha, (ante, p, 111). It is said to have been imparted by Śākya himself. The work is divided into three chapters. The 1st treats of the history of the fast ; the 2nd, its details ; and the 3rd, its obligations.

When Śākya was one day seated under a tree in the Nyagrodha Garden near the city of Kapilavastu, Vāśishṭha, a Brāhmaṇ of the Vāśishṭha gotra came to see him. The Brāhmaṇ had long nails and unkempt beard, and was very much emaciated and weak. Being asked by the Lord why he was so, he replied by saying that he had adopted the mensial fast (māsavratā) for the attainment of the fourfold blessing, fasting at a time for a month, and that having observed it for a hundred years he had been reduced to his present condition. The Lord said, "your nails and your beard and your abstinence from food for so long a time have not brought you at all near your object. Do you observe the fast of Uposhadha in honour of Ārya Avalokiteśvara, and you will at once attain your end." In course of further discussion on the subject, the Lord said that he had acquired adamantine hardness of body by observing the fast. He also narrated a story about two Brāhmaṇs in connection with it. He said in the time of Kāśyapa, when Kṛīkī was king of Benares, Paṭuvarmma and Hādivarmma, two Brāhmaṇ youths, saw a procession in the street and on enquiry learnt that Kṛīkī was going to the Lord Kāśyapa to hear the merits of the Uposhadha fast. The youths followed, and, having heard the Lord's sermon about it, performed the ceremony. By virtue of this fast the elder youth was born under the name of Sujāta, a son of Kṛīkī. The other, whose fast was vitiated by neglect in the observance of all the necessary details was born as a Nāga. He remembered, however, the circumstances of his former life, and besought Sujāta for help. The king issued a proclamation offering a golden throne to whoever would furnish him with the ritual of the fast. An old woman came forward and said, "break that column before me and you will get the ritual." The column was broken, and at the foot of it was found the ritual, inscribed on a golden tablet. The Nāga, having got the ritual performed the ceremony, and was translated to the heaven of Indra, where he was born a god, under the name of Uposhadha.

The proper time for the rite is the 8th of every waxing moon, whence the name Ashṭamīvrata. A hut having been erected with five kinds of sacred wood, Lokeśvara should be worshipped in it with proper offerings and mantra, the performer observing the purification of the eight members of his body before and after it for a week. Especial merit is attained if particular kinds of articles be presented and particular musical instruments be sounded. The details about these extend to several pages.

The most important abstinence during the performance of the rite is from cruelty to animals, and this is illustrated by a story. A king of Vaiśālī and his queen, having performed the rite and thereby obtained a precious jewel, was engaged in giving alms when Indra, having assumed the shape of a Brāhmaṇ, came forward and asked alms. The king said, "Let me know what you want, and it will be given." The Brāhmaṇ named the jewel. The king was greatly distressed at this ; but not to break his promise to a Brāhmaṇ he was about to give it, when Indra, assuming the shape of a hawk, darted at the jewel and carried it away. Then in the shape of the Brāhmaṇ, he threw his sword at the bird and killed it. The king finding that his jewel was about to be restored to him became glad, but Indra longing to have the jewel and frustrate the king's good word disappeared with it. The king and his country suffered long and grievously for the destruction of the hawk and the evil was not removed until the king, under the advice of Krakuchchhanda, performed the rite once again.

A disputation about caste. By Aśvaghosha. The work has been translated, in a very spirited style, 'into English by Mr. B.
H. Hodgson, and published in the 'Transactions of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain,' and also in the 'Essays,' (pp. 126f.).
Mr. Hodgson writes the name of the author Ashughosha, but the MS. gives it as I have put it above. The meaning of the name is "he who has the voice" (Ghosha) "of a horse" (aśva).
The first word (Aśva) is put in contradistinction to the name of the tutor Mañjughosha, "he of the sweet voice." Ashu is meaningless. The arguments used are very much of the same class with what is given on p. 225.

VASUNDHARĀ-VRATOTPATTI AVADĀNA.

वसुन्धराव्रतोत्पत्यवदानं ।

Substance, Nepalese paper, 11×2 $\frac{3}{4}$ inches. Folia, 23. Lines on a page, 5. Extent in ślokas, 350. Character, Newārī. Date, N. S. 923. Appearance, old. Verse. Incorrect.

On the origin of a fast in honour of a goddess named Vasundharā. The account is said to have been imparted to Ānanda by Śākya himself during his sojourn in the monastery of Ghoshīrā, in the suburbs of Kauśāmbī; but the work is palpably a modern one. The goddess claims the threefold form of Vasundharā or the earth, Mahā Lakshmi or great prosperity, and Kumārī or the virgin.

The story runs that in a remote period of antiquity, during the reign of a king named Śūryodaya, the inhabitants of the earth were very viciously disposed, and suffered much from famine and disease. Once, when a famine was at its height, some maids of honour of the great goddess Vasundharā happened, in course of their rambles, to pass over the earth, and to behold the distress men were immersed in. Touched by sympathy they solicited their mistress at Tushita to afford them some relief. Thereupon the goddess sent for her stewards, Nāndimukha and Āsvaghosha, and thus expressed her behest: "In the absence of a Tathāgata mankind have run into vice, and it is my wish to reclaim them by giving currency to my worship. Do you, therefore, descend on the earth, and by some contrivance or other win over king Śūryodaya, through whom my worship may be proclaimed."

The steward assumed the forms of bewitchingly beautiful damsels, and tried to win the king by sweet songs; but failed. Then assuming the forms of fierce boars they commenced to destroy the king's favourite garden. The king, hearing that two boars were destroying his garden, came forward with his men, who surrounded the place, and raised a dreadful uproar all round. The boars, thereupon, raised a hurricane, laid everything prostrate, enveloping the place in impenetrable darkness, and rushing past the king, so as to strike against him, escaped. The contact knocked down the king, and made him insensible; but he soon regained his senses, and, mounting his horse, chased after them. The boars then gave up their swinish form, entered the body of the king's horse, and galloped on across rivers and marshes till they reached a forest, when the horse stumbled and knocked down the king insensible on the ground. Of the king's retinue only one trooper was able to follow him in his wild run. He came to his help, and, when the king regained his senses and asked for a drink of water, ran to the nearest river for a supply.

When Senagupta, for that was the name of the soldier, had refreshed himself with a drink and was filling his can for his master, he beheld, on an island on the other side of the river, some Apsaras damsels engaged in frolic. The sight enchanted him, and he stood bewitched. When beckoned to approach near, he crossed the stream, and narrated to the damsels the history of his adventure. He then asked them what had brought them there. The Apsarases said they had come to perform the rite of Vasundharāvṛata. He then said, "if you will please instruct me in the details of the rite, I too would perform it." The damsels replied by saying that at early dawn on the second day of the moon in the month of Bhādra, or any other month, the performer should bathe himself, put on clean clothes, construct on a pure spot smeared with cowdung a diagram with metals, jewels, flowers, paddy or powdered stone, and place therein the emblems of the seven gods, and surround them with a line formed of paddy or any other of the articles aforementioned. The place should also be decorated with flags of yellow cloth, umbrellas and garlands of leaves and flowers, and the gods be there invited, and due offerings made to them. On the following morning the performer should bathe in a river, or a sacred pool, put on yellow cloth, and purify himself with the five products of the cow. Then facing the east contemplate and mentally worship the three jewels, and then worship the goddess Vasundharā with the usual mantras and offerings. After this worship he should tie round his wrist a protecting cord (raksha) formed of sixteen threads and having sixteen knots in it, and then pray for whatever he wishes. At night he should partake of barley meal, and keep awake the whole night. Next morning he should again worship the goddess, and then bidding her adieu, worship a human virgin, and then give a feast to his spiritual guide and others.

After hearing this account of the fast, Senagupta brought water to the king, and explained to him the reason of his delay. On his return home the king appointed Senagupta his priest, and celebrated the fast with great pomp. It was, however, not accomplished in due order. The queen Chūtadevī, who accepted the protecting cord at the time of celebrating the rite, afterwards thought it very offensive placed besides her jewelled bracelets, and tore and threw it out through a window. At this time a maid-servant of another queen who was residing in a Nimba Park was passing by the window, and the cord fell on her head. She took it respectfully, accepted the hospitality of the king, and, returning to her mistress, told the story of the cord and the merits of the fast. Thereupon both of them mentally performed the fast.

A short time after the goddess Vasundharā assumed the form of an old woman, and, coming to the gate of the king, sent a message to the queen through one of her maids, saying, that the queen's grandmother had come, and wanted to see her. The maid duly carried the message to her royal mistress, but the queen felt annoyed at it, and exclaimed "my grandmother! why she is long since dead; this is an imposter; go, and drive her away."

Thus repulsed, the old woman repaired to the Nimba forest, and was there most respectfully and hospitably entertained. This pleased her much, and she made herself manifest in her own real form. This is described as a handsome female of yellow complexion, having one head but six arms, holding in the right hands the emblems of blessing and of salutation to Buddha, and a handful of jewels, and in the left an auspicious jar (bhadrakṣa), a volume of the Prajñā, and a sheaf of corn. Through her blessings everything prospered in the home of the Nimba queen, and the king, forsaking his senior wife, lived with her.

Chūtadevī was greatly incensed by the conduct of the king, and in a furious passion ran to the Nimba Park. There, however, she heedlessly trod upon some flowers which had been offered to the goddess, and from the sin proceeding therefrom her head was immediately metamorphosed into that of a fierce sow. Looking at this the people of the neighbourhood raised an uproar, and out of shame she ran into a forest to hide herself. There she saw successively two birds quarrelling with each other, a large boar, a fox, a sow, and bit serpent. She repented of her sins, and, wishing to see the goddess herself, proceeded further, and, coming by a river, saw some damsels carrying golden pitchers on their hips. She asked them, "who are you? and where are you going to?" The damsels replied: "We are the maids of Vasundharā, come to fetch water from this river for her bath. This river flows only for her bath ; wash your eyes with its waters and you will see what you desire.”

She did so, and, immediately regaining her former shape, beheld the goddess before her. Saluting her most reverently she said, “Divine being, I have sinned most grievously. Do thou remit my sins ; I shall now perform the fast most reverently.”

The goddess was pleased with her repentance. She remitted her sins, and directed her to return home and perform the fast. In reply to further requests she explained the history of the sights Chūtadevi had seen in the forest. “The two birds,” said the goddess, “were formerly two sisters who quarrelled at meal, and therefore they have now become, two birds. The boar was formerly a housekeeper, and in that capacity he doled out half rations to the guests of his master, and purloined the other half, and this is his desert. The fox was formerly a learned Brāhmaṇ, and he dissuaded people by his sophistry from giving alms to Bauddhas, and therefore has he become a fox.” Chūtadevi explained to them their sins and ransomed them, and, returning home, performed the rite of Vāsundharā with her husband, and lived in peace and plenty.

This codex contains two works, both in the Newāri language, one a translation of the story of Kuśa of the Virakuśa Avadāna and the other Ashṭamīvrata-kathā, or story in praise of the Ashṭamī fast. Both are said to be extracts from the Divya Avadāna, translated into the Nepalese language by Amṛitānanda. The Ashṭamīvrata is the same with the Uposhadha or Poshadha rite described on page 265. The name here given refers to the age of the moon when it should be performed. The story given is in substance the same with what occurs in the Kuśa Jātaka, (ante, p. 110), but some of the names and details are changed. The jewel referred to in the Kuśa Jātaka is here said to have been obtained as a reward for performing the Ashṭamīvrata. The name of Kuśa's mother here is Alindā, Kuśa has aliases in Virūpa and Upavāsa Kuśa, and he obtains in this story a handsome shape by observing the fast under notice.

VRATĀVADĀNAMĀLĀ.

व्रतावदानमाला ।

Substance, Nepalese yellow paper, 16×8 inches. Folia, 70. Lines on a page, 6. Extent in ślokas, 2,109. Character, Newārī. Date, ? Appearance, old. Prose. Incorrect.

The work in its entirety comprises a number of stories in praise of various optional fasts or Vratas, but the codex under notice is a mere fragment, containing only the story of Suvarṇavarṇa, in three chapters, in praise of a rite called Lakshachaityavrata. From the name of the hero of the story the fragment is named Suvarṇavarṇāvadāna.

The principal interlocutors in this work are Jayaśrī and Jinaśrī, who quote the authority of Upagupta, who is said to have recounted the merits of the work to Aśoka. Upagupta says that on the Nirvāṇa of the Lord when Mahākāśyapa was at the head of the Church at Rājagṛha, one Divākara, son of Ratnākara, a merchant of Rājagṛha had reduced himself to great distress by excessive dissipation. Impelled by want and hunger and stung with the reproaches of his wife, he one day presented himself before Mahākāśyapa, and sought his advice.

Mahākāśyapa advised Divākara to perform the ceremony of Lakshachaitya. "Once on a time", said he, "Lord Buddha discoursed on the importance and the merits of the ceremony. He was then residing in the Champaka grove belonging to Viśvabhadra, a citizen of Padmapurī. While seated on a stone under the shade of a palm tree he, at the request of his followers, exhibited in the sky the model of a crystal chaitya surrounded by a hundred thousand other chaityas.

He brought them on the earth. He told them how Lord Vipāśyī showed the same thing to prince Pushpaketu, of Bandhumatī, to Chandraketu, to Sūryyaketu, and to prince Svarṇaketu, of Svarṇavati. He advised them to erect chaityas and worship them. Those that bathe the model chaityas with the perfumed waters of the Mandākinī river go to the residence of Sugata. One who desires to perform the ceremony of the Lakshachaitya should decorate the Dharmasālā of a Vihāra by raising the flags of Dharma, Ratna, Padma, and Vajra at the four corners. On the day previous to the ceremony, he should worship the image of the three jewels, and fast during the night. On the day of the ceremony, he should take an early bath, gather from the field different kinds of clay, temper them with milk, curd, ghī, cowdung and cow's urine. The clay should be purified by the repetition, twenty-one times, over it of the mantra called Virochaṇadhārāṇī. Then it should be shaped into a solid sphere with a tapering spire. The sphere should be opened in the middle and grass, rice, and five jewels placed into it. Such models should be worshipped to the extent of one hundred thousand, or any less number that may be convenient.

Viśvabhadra, on hearing this, entered the ascetic state, and became an Arhat. In one of his previous existences he had worshipped model chaityas, in consequence of which he obtained great excellence in this existence. He had then been a proud Brāhmaṇa, but was so humbled by poverty that he worshipped the models and obtained blessings from Vipāśyī.

II. The second chapter gives the story of Suvarṇavarṇa. The story runs that on hearing the merits of this fast from Kāśyapa, Divākara repaired to his home, and by the performance of the above ceremony obtained large profits in his own trade. Devendra advised him to worship the "three jewels," by virtue of which Divākara was blessed with a son named Suvarṇavarṇa. In his previous existence Suvarṇavarṇa was Puṇyamaheśa, a Devaputra of the thirty third heaven.

A short time after the birth of his son, Divākara undertook a distant maritime expedition. While he was away on his voyage, his son, Suvarṇavarṇa resorted one day to the Veṇuvana grove, and there happened to hear gāthās chanted by a Bhikshu in praise of high moral sentiments. He at once sought conversion to the true faith; but the Bhikshu objected. He said he could not convert a youth who had not obtained the permission of his parents. After many attempts to obtain the permission of his mother, the youth was obliged to wait till the return of his father. In the meanwhile he began to mix with Paṇḍitas, Śramaṇas and Brāhmaṇas. Whatever good sayings he heard he noted down in a book, which he used to read in his father's garden, outside the city. Close by this garden there was a villa belonging to one Prachaṇḍa, a minister of Ajāstaśatru, and the minister there enjoyed the society of a courtesan named Kāśisundarī. This woman was over head and ears in love with Suvarṇavarṇa, but Suvarṇavarṇa contemptuously rejected all her advances. Desperate in her amour, she broke an engagement with Prachāṇḍa, and entered Suvarṇavarṇa's garden with a view to charm him with all her blandishments. Prachāṇḍa, impatient to have her society, sent messenger after messenger after her, and at last traced her where she was. He went to her, beat her, tore her hair, and, furious with rage, ordered an orderly immediately to put her to death. But the man charged with this infernal commission was moved by her piteous entreatise, and fled away. He was pursued to a long distance by Prachāṇḍa, who, when he found the chase hopeless, returned with a view to destroy Kāśīsundarī with his own hands. During this interval Kāśīsundarī ran to the nearest wall of the garden in order to scale over it and escape, but failed in the attempt on account of the great height of the wall. No sooner Prachāṇḍa found her near the wall than he gave her a violent kick. Stunned by the blow she fell insensible, and was bitten by a black snake on whose body she fell. Prachāṇḍa, finding her dead, returned home, and sent officers to search the garden of Suvarṇavarṇa for the dead body, and to charge the owner of the garden with the murder. The king made over the investigation of the case to Prachāṇḍa, who, with only the show of a trial, ordered Suvarṇavarṇa to the stake. Just at this moment Divākara returned from his distant voyage, and Lord Kāśyapa, obtained Nirvāṇa, leaving Ānanda at the head of his congregation.

Ānanda lived at Vaiśālī. Divākara prayed for his intervention. Ānanda, by virtue of his power of working miracles, presented himself before the king, persuaded him to reverse the order of punishment ; but, at the instigation of Prachāṇḍa, the executioner hurried on his business. Suvarṇavarṇa was already placed on the stake when the royal messengers reached the place of execution. But the stake had been already deprived of its sting. Ānanda had miraculously produced a lotus on the top of the stake whereon Suvarṇavarṇa felt himself very comfortable. By the instructions received from Ānanda, Suvarṇavarṇa obtained true knowledge. Kāśīsundarī was resuscitated by a charm. She felt a dislike for womanhood on account of the manifold dangers by which it is surrounded. She prayed Ānanda to turn her into a man. Her femininity disappeared, she renounced the world, and was soon enobled as an Arhat. There was no bound to Divākara's delight when he heard of the sudden change of his son's fortune. Suvarṇavarṇa, renounced the world, and became an Arhat. The king no longer countenanced Prachāṇḍa. He withdrew his protection from him, and proclaimed him an outlaw. He was kicked, insulted, and severely beaten by those whom in his prosperity he had injured. In his distress Prachāṇḍa, too, sought the protection of Ānanda. He entered the Pravrajyā, and became an Arhat.

The king then enquired from Ānanda the reasons why Suvarṇa-varṇa, Kāśisundarī, and Prachāṇḍa, though so different in their dispositions, should come to the same end. The reply is given in the next chapter.

III.—When Lord Vipāśyī was at Bandhumatī, there lived a merchant named Karṇa in that city. His wife was eniente when he went on a distant voyage. During his absence his house was destroyed by fire, his lands inundated, and his wealth stolen. The son that was born unto him was extremely ugly, full of a putrid smell in his body, and universally disliked. His wife lived in a wretched hovel, and maintained herself by menial service. All her servants left her, except one faithful maid, who was personally attached to her. The son was named Virūpa on account of his ugliness. His mother maintained him by serving as a maid-servant. But in a short time she could not even find menial employment. Virūpa was obliged to beg from door to door; but the offensive smell issuing from his body disgusted every one. People hooted him, and pelted stones at him. He had to pass days together without even a morsel of food. Mortified at this Virūpa went to his father's garden, determined to put a period to his existence.

Karṇa, the merchant, returned home at this time, having lost all his wealth by a shipwreck. But there he found no relief. He found his house, his wealth, his land, everything gone. His wife was in a most wretched state, lean, lank and cheerless. These sudden and rapid reverses of fortune, induced him to worship the Lord. He went to Vipāśyī, and surrendered himself at his feet. By this piece of good work he obtained a boon never after to become poor even for a day. Virūpa was at this time lying almost dead in his father's garden; Lord Vipāśpī revived him; removed the offensive smell from his person; and turned his ugliness into beauty. His skin became of a golden colour. That maid-servant of Karṇa, who had not deserted his wife in her distress, also obtained Arhatship from Vipāśyī.

Karṇa invited the Lord to his house, and entertained him with his whole congregation. He also performed the ceremony of Chait-yavrata.

When the king Bandhumān expired he was succeeded by his son Śrīmān. Śrīmān, dying without an heir, was succeeded by Virūpa, now called Surūpa on account of the transformation. Surūpa lived long and made his kingdom prosperous and happy.

Surūpa was Suvarṇavarṇa ; Karṇa, Divākara ; Karṇa's wife, Divākara's wife ; her faithful maid was Kāśīsundarī ; and the maid-servant of Karṇa was Prachanda.

Ajātaśatru then asked Ānanda the reason why should Suvarṇavarṇa be placed on the stake though he was guiltless ?

Ānanda replied ;

Chandra was a great Buddha. At the time of his advent there was in a Vihāra a Bhikshu, who preached to Brāhmaṇas and others. Once on a time another Bhikshu, named Ajita, came to that Vihāra. He was very eloquent, and a perfect master of the art of oratory. He soon eclipsed the fame of the Bhikshu of the Vihāra. He wanted to ruin Ajita. He caused a calumny to be spread by a Brāhmaṇ girl that Ajita had unlawful connection with her. When Ajita complained that such ugly things should be whispered against his stainless character, he was told that he deserved to be placed on the stake for his crime. Ajita, disgusted at the conduct of the Bhikshu of the Vihāra, left the place. Now the eyes of the new Bhikshu was opened. He found that he had done wrong. He pursued Ajita to a great distance, fell at his feet, and obtained his pardon. Suvarṇavarṇa was that Bhikshu. Because he had uttered the harsh words "you deserve the stake for your crime" he was placed on the stake. He was rich, because he performed the Chaityavrata.

After the relation of these stories both Ajātaśatru and Divākara performed the Chaityavrata.

CHAITYA-PUNĠAVA.

चैत्यपुङ्गवः ।

Substance, Nepalese yellow paper, 13×3 inches. Folia, 38. Lines

N. S. 905. Appearance, old. Prose. Incorrect.

On a rite called Chaitya-puṅgava or the adoration of Chaityas, and the rituals and merits thereof.

When the Lord was seated under a palm tree in a grove of Champaka trees in the hermitage of Viśyachandraka, near the town of Padmapuri, he noticed that his followers were thinking of what he had said regarding the rite of Chaityas. Thereupon he caused the apparition of a jewelled Chaitya to appear in the sky, and then, at the request of a Bodhisattva, Suchetana by name, caused a tumult

(chaitya) of crystals to rise on the earth, and gave directions for the performance of the rite in question. The chaitya is to be made of pure clay mixed with the five products of the cow, the five nectars, the five jewels and the five aromatics. The mixture is then to be kneaded seven times while repeating the Samantabhadra mantra. The shape is to be a rounded one with a tapering top. The figure, being then anointed with oil, is to be placed in the centre of an altar, duly worshipped, and then cut across in a slanting direction. From the womb of the bisected figure the light of chaitya, (chaitya vimba—what this is I know not) is to be extracted, and placed on a jewelled throne, and there worshipped according to the ritual given in the text. The six Pāramitās are to be duly observed during the time the worship is made. This leads to questions from Suchetana as to how men descend from the region of the Devas ? how they become Devas ? and how they pass from one mortal shape to another ? The Lord replies that those who follow the practice of the Yoga, are merciful, attached to truth, devoid of anger, malice, and delusion, engaged in beneficent works, and follow the right path, repair to the region of the Devas. Those who are virtuous, obedient to their tutors, and respectful to good people, pass from one human body to another. Those who are otherwise become after death devils, Asuras and inferior animals, according to their deserts. Thereupon Viśvabhadra, a person of noted charity, who was present in the assembly, immediately obtained conversion, and attained Arhathood. Requested to explain the cause of this sudden translation, the Lord said Viśvabhadra was, in a former existence, a Brāhmaṇ of great learning, master of the four Vedas and of all the Śāstras. Finding them to be false, he betook to the constant worship of Chaityas and to the dissemination of the true religion whereby many persons obtained the highest reward, and through the merit of those works he now attained Arhatship.

The rite here described is obviously the same with the Chaitya-vrata noticed in the next preceding work.

An amplified version of Chānakya's collection of moral maxims. The recension current in Bengal contains only 108 stanzas. The quotations are mostly from the Mahābhārata and other Hindu works, and the collection professes to be a Hindu work. It has got currency among the Buddhists from the circumstance of the maxims inculcated being good, and not very sectarian.

A charm for ensuring success in warfare. Indra, having been overpowered by other gods, sought the protection of the Lord, and the Lord, out of his overflowing kindness, taught him this charm which, he said, he had obtained from a Tathāgata of the name of Dhvajā. The charm begins with the words jaya jaya vijaya vijaya jayavahinī śaṅkarī praśaṅkarī prataṅkarī bhañjanī prabhañjanī, &c.

On the merits of charity, abstinence, &c., during the period of the Buddhist lent called Kāṭhina. This period extends to thirty days from the 1st of the new moon in the month of Āśvina. Gifts to Bhikshus and recital of stories in praise of charity are the principal observances. The rules were expounded by the Lord himself at the request of Kāśyapa. The Lord thereafter repaired to the Gandhamādana mountain along with a following of 500 ascetics. Arriving at the Anavatapta Lake, the Lord and his following sat each on a jewelled lotus as large as a cart wheel, and then Nāgira, a Bhikshu, said that having cheerfully given alms during the period of lent he had never suffered from any misfortune for thirty great kalpas, and for eighteen kalpas had enjoyed the pleasures of heaven; on sixty four occasions he had become Indra, eighty times a Chakravarti monarch, &c., &c. Kāśyapa, Sumanā, Maṅgalyāyana and others made similar confessions. The object of the work seems to be, to enjoin confession during the lent.

Account of a continent called Padmadhātu, of its king Araṇemi, of his priest and 500 sons, and of its Tathāgata Ratnagarbha, interspersed with many anecdotes and stories, concluding with directions for the dissemination of the true religion on the Nirvāṇa of the Lord. The work is divided into five chapters (parivartas), and its leading expounder is Śākya himself, speaking in response to queries of Maitreya and others. The work was translated into the Chinese under the name of Pei-hwa-king by Dharmaraksha, of the northern Liang dynasty (Circa 502—555.)

Contents, I.—Description of the continent of Padma. The scene opens with an account of an assembly held on the Vulture Peak near Rājagṛha. The Lord commenced a discourse on the great secret Sūtra entitled Charyāvaisāradya, when suddenly rays of light of various colours issued forth and illumined all the three thousand regions, even to the depth of the darkest hell, where the light of the sun and the moon had never reached before ; Buddhist sacred places became specially resplendent thereby ; the earth shook in six different rays ; heavenly flowers fell in showers ; and celestial music resounded everywhere. Beholding these prodigies Ratnavairochana uncovered one of his shoulders and, kneeling on his right knee, addressed the Lord in order to know whence these wonders came forth. The Lord thereupon gave an account of a region named Padma. It was situated to the south-east of Jambudvīpa. It contained Buddhist sacred places, innumerable as the grains of sand on the banks of the river Ganges. The Bodhi tree there was named Indra, and under it, there was a lotus 500 yojanas in circumference, seated on a stalk made of lapis lazuli ; the leaves of this plant were of gold, each leaf being 15 yojanas in circumference. On this lotus sat the Tathāgata Padmottara, and around him were Bodhisattvas innumerable, each seated on a lotus. At the last watch of the night Padmottara attained Buddhahood, and at early dawn set the avaivartika wheel in motion, and thereupon millions over millions of rays of light issued forth, and these were the causes of the prodigies.

II.—In reply to the questions of Ratnavairochana the Lord gave further descriptions of the continent of Padma and of Padmottara. The size of the continent of Padma was such that were one by a miracle to pound down the great Sumeru mountain to grains each not bigger than a mustard seed, multiply those grains four times, and spread them smoothly side by side, the area covered would represent the extent of that continent. Padmottara had 30 kalpas for the duration of his life. After his Nirvāṇa the true religion lasted for ten kalpas, and then Bodhisattvas who had been born there lived for 40 kalpas. Formerly this continent was named Chandanalokadhātu, and it had been ministered by the Tathāgata named Chandrottama for 20 kalpas. At the request of Gaganamudra, a Bodhisattva, that saint had prophesied that ten kalpas after his Nirvāṇa Padmottara would be born. He also taught that Bodhisattva certain Dhāraṇīs of great potency.

III.—On the miraculous powers of Padmottara. Śāntimati, a Bodhisattva, enquired of the Lord how it was that while other Tathāgatas acquired perfection by overcoming the five attachments, Padmottara attained Buddhahood while retaining them. The five attachments are—the attachment for existence (A'yuh kashāya) ; that of fancy (Kalpa kashāya) ; that of beings (Sattva kashāya) ; that of sight (Dṛshṭi kashāya) ; and that of pain. He then related the story of Araṇemi. This king lived in a very remote kalpa named Dharma. His household priest was Samudrareṇu, whose son Samudragarbha, relinquishing his home, attained the perfect Bodhi knowledge, and assumed the name of Ratnagarbha. Attended by a numerous retinue of Bhikshus, he travelled from country to country, and at last arrived at a Jambu grove near the metropolis of Araṇemi. The news of this arrival reaching Araṇemi, the king immediately came to him, and solicited his abidance at the place as his guest for three months. On the expiry of this period one thousand sons of Araṇemi, one after another, made a similar request, and the saint granted it in every instance. When thrice one thousand months had expired Samudrareṇu invited and entertained his son for seven years. Once this Brāhmaṇa speculated on what could be the object of Araṇemi in entertaining the saint. Does he aspire to the position of a Deva ? or of an Indra ? or of the possession of illimitable wealth and power ? or of the perfect Bodhi knowledge ? That night he dreamt a dream. He saw that Buddhas from innumerable sacred places had sent him presents of lotuses having leaves of gold, stalks of silver, and pericarps of lapislazuli. On each lotus was 'seen a sun, with a jewelled umbrella over it, and six billions of rays issued from each sun, and fell on his face. He, moreover, saw his own self clear as a mirror of the expanse of a thousand yojanas, and in it he beheld sixty billions of Bodhisattvas seated on lotuses, and celestial music resounding therein. He saw, too, the king Araṇemi seated, with the face of a hog and his body bespattered with blood, under a castor plant after devouring various animals there. Other animals feasted on the bones that were left after the meal of their king. The Brāhmaṇ then saw some of the princes, with faces of jackals, wolves, boars, lions and dogs and bespattered with blood, chasing other animals, and after feasting on their bodies seating themselves under castor trees. Other animals feasted on the remains of the animals destroyed. He saw other princes richly dressed and ornamented, mounted on chariots drawn by buffaloes, addressing him thus : "Divide these lotuses among the king and the princes." He did so, and then, waking up, went to the saint, and asked the meaning of the dream. The saint did so, and also expounded the meaning of the details of the dream ; adding : "Since you have for the good of creation entertained us for seven years, you will acquire the perfect knowledge." The Brāhmaṇ then learnt the true knowledge, and advised the king and the princes to retire from worldly affairs, and to devote themselves to the contemplation of true knowledge for seven years. They confined themselves in their chambers, and did so. After a time Samudrarenū requested his son to invite them to his presence. The saint performed a Samādhi from which issued forth various lights ; he then called the parties to his presence, and blessed them.

IV.—Lord Padmaprabha, having performed the Samādhi named Bodhisattvachittāpromosha, gently smiled, whereupon a brilliant light spread all over the universe, and made all Buddhist sacred places manifest to the king and the rest of the congregation. The king then prayed the Lord to be translated to a world where there was no hell, no avarice, no region of Yama ; where all beings were brilliant as gold and endowed with the memory of their former existence, and with such transcendental sight that they could behold all Buddhist sacred places, and be ever devoted to the true religion. The Lord directed him towards the west, to a world which was named Sudrasuvirājita, and which tallied in every respect with the description. The Tathāgata of this world was Indraghoshaśvararāja. After many ages this Tathāgata would be followed by Achintamatigururāja who would be followed by Maraprabha. The true religion would last for 16 kalpas and then disappear. It would be revived by Rashmi a thousand kalpas afterwards. Then will come Ravoreshvara who will be followed by Aparameya, after whom you will by a Tathāgata under the name of Amitāyūh, when that world would be called Sukhavatī. The king's sons then, one after another, came forward, and prayed for the perfect knowledge, and each of them was assured that he would become a Buddha at some time or other. The five sons of the Brāhmaṇ and a number of others obtained the blessing of salvation. The Brāhmaṇ appeared last, and he was told that in the Kali age, he would appear as Śākya Siṅha, and that a thousand years after his ministry the religion would disappear, (a prophecy which has not been verified, unless we take it to mean India only).

V.—At the request of the Brāhmaṇ, Padmaprabha then gave descriptions, among many others of the following Samādhis, viz., Surāṅgamā, Ratnamudrā, Siṅha-vikṛitā, and Suchandrā. He gave in detail also the merits of these Samādhis. Thereupon the king with his one thousand sons and numerous followers and officers retired from the world, and accepted the initiatory rite of asceticism. On the Nirvāṇa of Ratnagarbha seven jewelled Chaityas were erected on his remains, and the Brāhmaṇ Samudrareṇu became the teacher, and spread wide the knowledge of the great truth for many kalpas, after which he was born in the family of a Chaṇḍāla in Saṅkarakaṇa, a Buddhist region of great sanctity. His teachings there were highly appreciated, and they served to raise the duration of human life to five hundred years from eighty years, which was the duration before his birth. He was, moreover, on the death of the king, appointed king, under the name of Punyabala. By his might and valour he brought the whole of Jambudvīpa under his sway. Once he proclaimed that he would give any gift that his people sought of him. Thousands over thousands came and got what they wanted, but at last came one Pāṇsughosha, a Jīvaka, who said he wished to become a Vid'yādhara in his present existence, and for that purpose required the skin and eyes of a living man to be given him by that person cheerfully and without any scruple. This was a hard prayer to grant, but the king was not unequal to it. He plucked out his eyes from their sockets, and gave them away, and told the beggar to skin the body as he listed. After death, he was again born in the family of a Chaṇḍāla, raised to the rank of a king, and ultimately brought to his end by giving away his tongue and ears to beggars. He was then born as king Indradhvaja. He had a thousand sons, all of whom, except six, retired from the world, and became hermits. He divided Jambudvīpa into six parts, gave the parts to his householding sons, and himself retired to a hermitage. In his next birth he was king Pradīpapradyota. On one occasion, having seen a man tied to a post, he asked why was the man so treated? His minister reported that the person had failed to pay the king's dues. The king ordered him to let the man loose at once.

The minister hesitated, adding if the man were let loose he would set a bad example, and no one would pay any government revenue.

He answered, "Yes, Sire, no one pays any revenue of his own accord."

Disgusted with the world, the king made over his kingdom to his five hundred sons, and retired to a hermitage. While there, he perceived, by his miraculous power, that five hundred merchants had lost their way on the ocean in darkness, and were in imminent danger of being lost. He then tied some cloth on his forearm, steeped it in oil, set fire to it, and held it up as a beacon for the merchants to find their way. In his next birth he was king Ambaralia Sarvandada. A Vedic student, named Jyotirasa, begged of him the kingdom of the earth, and it was forthwith given. Next came Rocha, a Brāhmaṇ, who asked and obtained the two legs of the king. Next came Dishṭārava, another Brāhmaṇ, who wanted the king's eyes. The king immediately plucked them out, and gave them away. Then came yet another Brāhmaṇ, who wanted the king's ears. Others came forward, all *Brāhmaṇ*s, and begged successively for the remaining members of the king's person, and they were all readily satisfied. In his next birth he became a Nāga king, Nidhisandarśana by name, and in this state he gave away a profusion of rare jewels, and this is the person who after a few other births has become Śākya Sinha. The chapter concludes with an eulogium on the merits of hearing, reading, knowing, bearing on the person this auspicious Mahāyāna sūtra.

DHĀRAṆĪS.

No. B 5 has already been noticed, (p. 80) but the description given does not convey a full idea of its contents. It comprises 39 Dhāraṇīs designed for averting various evils, or securing certain desiderated blessings. B 65 contains 12, some of which are included in B 5. From the illustrations given of Dhāraṇīs in the preceding pages, the nature of Dhāraṇīs and the unintelligible jargon in which they have been written have already been made clear, and nothing further need be said of them here. All of them have been attributed to Śākya Siṃha himself, who declares that he had got them from previous Buddhas, or designed them himself by his miraculous power. Each Dhāraṇī is preceded by a brief account of the circumstances which led to its being promulgated, and followed by an enumeration of the benefits to be derived by wearing them enclosed in amulets, or hearing them frequently repeated.

No. B 5 comprises the following Dhāraṇīs, viz. :—

- 1, Harāhara-hṛdayā ; 2, Abhayaṅkarī ; 3, Sahasrāvartā ; 4, Siṃhanādā ; 5, Śaḍakṣharita-mahāvidyā ; 6, Avalokiteśvara-siddhikā ; 7, Do. A collection of stories alleged to have been related to Aśoka by Upagupta in illustration of the merits of various acts of virtue.

Contents I. Story of Sundara. When Aśoka held his court at Pāṭaliputra, some merchants came to his presence, and offered him many valuable presents. The king was greatly pleased, and, proud of the personal beauty of his son Kunāla, showed him to them, and asked them if they had, in course of their peregrinations on the face of the earth, ever seen a more handsome boy. They replied in the affirmative, and said that the name of the youth they had seen was Sundara, and that on his birth a beautiful tank and a fine garden were produced, which were greatly attached to him, and followed him wherever he went. He was immediately sent for, and the king was greatly surprised at the unrivalled beauty of the boy, and his wonderful attendants. To solve the mystery, he repaired to his religious tutor, Upagupta, at the monastery of Kukkuṭārāma. He was followed by the youth who, listening to the teachings of the saint, begged to be ordained, and was immediately assigned the rank of an Arhat. Even more surprised than before, the king begged for explanation. Upagupta replied, on the nirvāṇa of the Lord Śākya Buddha his principal disciple Kāśyapa roamed about in great distress of mind. A farmer of the Magadha country, seeing him and his five hundred followers in their distress, received them kindly, offered them fresh clear water for bathing, and entertained them with food with every mark of devotion. Kāśyapa was much pleased with this hospitality, and at the request of the farmer, said that he would in a future life become, as he desired, an Arhat. "That farmer is born as Sundara, and his former good deeds have now fructified in Arhatship."

II. Story of Pūrṇabhadra alias Sampūrṇa. Given in the Avadāna-śataka, ante, p. 17.

III. Story of Sārthavāha. Ditto ditto, ante, p. 21.

IV. Story of Chandana. When the lord was travelling in the Magadha country, his followers noticed an old, weather-worn, dilapidated chaitya, and enquired to whose honour it had been erected. The Lord said it had been erected by the disciples of a former Buddha, named Chandana, and, in reply to further enquiries gave an account of the Buddha in question. In former times Brahma-datta, king of Benares, worshipped many gods in the hope of getting a son; but to no avail. Once he noticed with surprise an infant in the cup of a lotus. The child was very beautiful and had the aroma of sandal wood on his body, for which reason he was named Chandana. When the boy grew up and walked about, at every step he moved, a lotus was produced. This lotus sparkled for a short time and then withered away. The youth, studying this fact, thought that since the produce of his body was evanescent, his body must likewise be so. Thinking so he lost all attachment for worldly objects, and devoted himself to religion. Through the effect of his former good deeds and his devotion he became, under the direction of Lord Kāśyapa, a Pratyak Buddha, and on his nirvāṇa his disciples erected the stūpa. He was very assiduous in offering sandal-paste and lotus flowers to the chaitya of Kāśyapa, and thence resulted the peculiar aroma of his body and the production of lotus flowers from his feet. This story occurs also in the Dvāviṃśa Avadāna, ante, p. 88. Anecdotes regarding Chandana occur on pp. 22, 23 and 198.

V. Story of Pr̥tyapreta. Given in the Avadāna-śataka, ante, p. 30.

VI. Story of Kṛṣṇasarpa. A householder of great wealth but of an excessively miserly disposition, dying in the town of Rājagṛha, became a black serpent in a garden of king Vimbisāra, and killed by his very sight whoever came near him. The king, not knowing how to destroy this dreadful reptile, went to the Lord, who was then sojourning in the Bamboo Grove, and sought his assistance. Thereupon the Lord repaired to the garden, and cast a benign look on the serpent. The serpent was charmed by the sight, and mentally abjured all wicked thoughts. The Lord brought him to his monaserty, and instructed him in the principles of religion. So instructed, the serpent killed himself by continuous fasting, and repaired to the Trayasiṃha heaven. There, however, he did not feel satisfied. He longed to serve the Lord, and therefore came back to the earth, and became a disciple of the Lord, who taught him all the rules, principles, and precepts of religion, and made him an adept. Thoroughly enlightened by this teaching, the serpent, now a Deva, pointed out to the king Vimbisāra the spot where he had kept his wealth concealed in the garden, and, requesting him to devote him to devote it to religious purposes, returned to heaven.

VII. Story of Suvarṇābha. Given in the Avadāna-śataka, ante, p. 34.

VIII. Story of Prabhavā. She was the maiden daughter of a rich merchant of Śrāvastī. Courted by princes and other great people of the town, she rejected their addresses, and betook to the Lord, who ordained her an Arhat. The good deed which secured her this high honour was her devotion, in a former life, when she was the chief queen of king Bandhumat, to the Lord Vipāśyī, to whom she gave all her valuable ornaments. This story forms the 71st Avadāna of the Avadāna-śataka, but the name given her there is Śuklā, cf. p. 35.

IX. Story of Samudra. Samudra was the son of a rich merchant of Śrāvastī. He was born on board of a ship when his father was returning from a voyage to the island of Ratnākara, and thereby got his name of Samudra or the ocean. When he attained his majority, his father sent him to Ratnākara on a commercial mission, in the company of a large body of experienced merchants. Out in the sea, his vessel was overtaken by a hurricane, and was in imminent risk of being lost. His companions, finding all other resources vain, began to pray, invoking Śiva, Rudra, Gaṇeśa, Nārāyaṇa, Indra, Yama, &c., each according to his fancy, but the gods granted them no help. At last an old Buddhist advised them to pray to Buddha, who alone could help them. They did so, and the Lord, knowing of it, created a golden coloured blaze of light the sight of which frightened the storm, which at once subsided. The voyage subsequently proved prosperous, and the merchants returned home, laden with wealth. Nor were they unmindful of the divinity who had helped them. They repaired to the Jetavana grove where the Lord was then sojourning, and offered rich presents. Listening to his religious discourses, they were induced to pray for initiation, and were accordingly ordained Arhats. In explanation of the merits which ensured them this blessing the Lord said, in former times there lived on the sea-shore a kind-hearted Buddhist hermit, learned in the Vedas, cherishing the sacred fire, dressed in a blanket, having matted locks on his head, and supporting himself on roots and fruits. A body of five hundred traders came to him from Benares, worshipped him, attained his blessings, and then proceeded to the island of Ratnākara for commerce. In the way, on their return voyage, their ship was overtaken by a fearful storm, and was on the point of foundering. They called to mind the hermit on the shore, and prayed for his help. They were saved, and they made their acknowledgments to the saint for his miraculous interposition, and prayed for spiritual blessing. The hermit said, "When I shall become a Buddha, the leader of men, I shall place you in the asylum of Buddhism. I am that hermit, and these merchants headed by Samudra, are the traders of old."

X. Story of Subhūti. During the ministry of the Lord Śākya Siṃha a large number of his disciples were deputed to different parts of the earth to disseminate his doctrines. Some of the disciples had taken their way to the top of the Himālaya mountain. When they were engaged in their meditation there, a Garuḍa perched on a peak, holding a serpent in its beak. The serpent, seeing the pious men, resolved to become one like them in his next birth. He was born as the son of a Brāhmaṇ householder of Śrāvastī, and was named Subhūti, after his mother Bhūti. When grown up, he became passionate in his disposition, and the least annoyance would put him into violent fits of anger. His father sent him to school, and had him instructed in all the learning of the Brāhmaṇs, including the Vedas, but the education did not suffice to improve his disposition. His tutor, failing in his other endeavours, at last directed him to betake to a hermit's life, and pass his time in meditation in a forest. He did so, and while he was so engaged, a sylvan goddess appeared before him and said, "Why are you, good man, passing your time in meditation in this solitary place, converting yourself into a log of wood, or a block of stone? If you long for religion, betake to the doctrine of Buddha." She then exhibited a miraculous temple in the air, and disappeared. The sight of the temple purified the mind of the youth, and he sought the asylum of the Lord, and was duly ordained a Śrāvaka of the highest rank. In reply to a question of his audience the Lord said, "In a former existence, when the span of human life extended to twenty thousand years, this man had performed of Brahmacharya for a thousand years at Benares under the tuition of Lord Kāśyapa, and obtained a boon that during my ministry he would become a Śrāvaka of the highest rank. In a subsequent existence he was rough of speech and quarrelsome in the monastery where he lived, and that led to his being born a poison-mouthed serpent for five thousand generations."

XI. Story of Yaśovatī. When Lord Śākya Siṅha was sojourning in a palace on the bank of the Markaṭa tank, in Vaiśālī, he thought of Yaśovatī, the daughter-in-law of Siṅha Senāpati, as a person who had been destined to become a Buddhist, and went to pay her a visit. He and his followers were received with great respect by the lady, and most sumptuously treated. Afterwards when he was seated at ease and discoursing on religion, the lady offered him a profusion of gold jewels and rich dresses. Through the miraculous power of the Lord these flew up in their air and formed a canopy over the head of the Lord. The Lord then smiled, and out from his mouth issued a flame of light which irradiated and filled the universe with joy, and, releasing the dwellers of hell from their bondage, disappeared in the matted locks of the Lord. The Lord then said, "Three Kalpas hence this lady will acquire the highest perfection in true knowledge, and become a Buddha under the name of Ratnamatī."

XII. Story of the Kauravyas. In course of his travels the Lord once came to the suburbs of the city of Kaurava, and the people of that place, hearing of his advent, felt great delight, and prepared to go and welcome him. The Tirthikas of the place, however, did not like this excitement, and went from door to door to dissuade the people from seeing the Lord. They spread evil reports of him, and reviled him in every way. Those among the people who were wicked listened to their advice, and refrained from visiting him; but a few good persons among them came. The Tirthikas, having prevented the people, themselves came to see him. The Lord felt that it was necessary to show some miracles, and accordingly willed. Thereupon Indra came down from heaven with heavy loads of Gośirsha sandal wood, and employed Viśvakarmā to erect a palace. The palace was forthwith completed, and, when the Lord had entered it, the Devas worshipped him, and revelled in music, song and rejoicings. The news of the festival spread wide, and the people of Kaurava, thereby excited, rejected the advice of the Tirthikas, and, taking their seats before the Lord, listened to his lecture. The Tirthikas remained outside, admiring the sculptured ornaments and the beauty of the palace. The Lord perceiving this, suddenly suppressed the palace, and appeared seated in an open field. The Tirthikas could no longer resist the influence of the Lord; they fell at his feet, listened to his discourse, and got themselves converted. Some became Sāvakas, some Pratyakbodhis, some Anuttarabodhis, and some Arhats. Thereupon the Lord made the palace manifest again, and dwelt therein for three months. "Formerly," said the Lord, "there lived a Buddha named Brahmā, and a Kshatriya king erected for him a palace of Gośirsha sandal wood and worshipped him there for three months. I am that Kshatriya king."

XIII. Story of Padmottara. When the Lord was passing through the highway of Śrāvastī a young lady with her little boy stood on the roadside to behold him. When he came near her, the little boy threw a lotus to him, and the lotus immediately assumed the size of a cart-wheel, and, rising in the air, formed an umbrella over the head of the Lord. "This lad," said the Lord to Ānanda, "will enjoy all the pleasures of the world for a thousand kalpas, and then become a Pratyak Buddha under the name of Padmottara."

XIV. Story of Chandra. This story occurs in the Avadānaśataka (story LII), but the substance of it as given on p. 32, is incorrect in some important particulars. The youth went to the Lord with Anāthapiṇḍada only once, and, on return home, fell ill of fever, and died. On his death he repaired to heaven, but, longing to visit the Lord again, came down, and saw his father crying with his corpse on his lap. Appearing before his father in the garb of a ṛshi, he asked him why he held the corpse in his lap instead of cremating it? The Brāhmaṇ said, "This is the body of my only son, and I want it to be revived." Chandra replied, "Were you to cry continuously for a thousand years, it still cannot revive. Were the sun to rise towards the West, were fire to be as cold as ice, were fishes to dwell on the crests of mountains, still the corpse will not regain his life. If you wish for your son's welfare, go and burn his body, and throw his bones into the river Ganges." The Brāhmaṇ could not, however, be induced to do as he was told. Chandra, thereupon, assumed the shape of a Deva, and gave an account of what had happened to him, and advised his father to dispose of the corpse, and betake to the asylum of the Three Jewels whereby he would be translated to heaven, and there enjoy the society of his son. The Chandra of the story was afterwards born as Śākya. Anecdotes of this person occur on pp. 14, 96 and 279.

XV. Story of Sugandhi. Sugandhi, son of a merchant of Kapilavastu, and noted for having the aroma of the lotus and sandal wood on his body, came to the Lord in the Nyagrodha monastery, and was ordained an Arhat. On being asked the reason of this sudden exaltation, the Lord said, "This youth had, in a former life, worshipped the chaitya of Vipāśyi, and anointed it with aromatic oil, and through the merit thereof he has the aroma on his body, and has been so exalted."

XVI. Story of Supriyā. Anāthapiṇḍada had a daughter, named Supriyā. Immediately after her birth she looked up towards her mother, and recited a gāthā to the effect that gifts should be given in profusion to Buddhists and Champaka flowers should be strewed on sacred places. Her father did as she wished. Afterwards, the instructions of a saint who came for alms to her father's house, made a deep impression on her mind in her early girlhood. She had, moreover, the faculty of recalling to mind the events of her former existences. On her 7th year she obtained the permission of her parents to become a nun, and Gautamī, by order of the Lord, ordained her. Soon after, a famine breaking out, the Lord directed his followers to seek the charity of Supriyā. She herself begged alms from poor householders, and relieved the distress of all suffering people. Three months after, when the Lord was proceeding from Śrāvastī to Rājagṛha, he arrived at the middle of a forest where no food of any kind could be had. Supriyā, seeing that the followers of the Lord would be put to great distress, held forth her alms-bowl, and prayed that if she had any stock of former good deeds it should help her by filling her bowl with food. A forest divinity heard her prayer, and filled her bowl with nectar, with which she entertained the Lord and his followers. Her good deeds now sufficed to raise her to the rank of an Arhat, the adorer of gods. In explaining why he raised her to the rank of an Arhat, the Lord said, "Formerly in the time of the Lord Kāśyapa, a maid-servant, in the city of Benares, was carrying some cakes for her master, but, meeting Kāśyapa on the way on his begging excursion, gave him the cakes intended for her master. The Lord converted her, and for ten thousand years afterwards she had bestowed alms to Buddhists. That maid-servant has now been born as Supriyā."

XVII. Story of Sumanā. There lived at Śrāvastī a merchant, who had successively lost three sons immediately after their birth. He once invited a Śramaṇa of the name of Aniruddha, and, after entertaining him with every mark of respect, prayed that he may have a son who should not die so early, promising that if the boy lived up to the 7th year he would present him to his guest. The blessing of the saint fulfilled the prayer, and the new-born boy was named Sumanā, and on his 7th year he was given away to Aniruddha, who made him a Bhikshu, and ultimately an Arhat. One day Aniruddha asked the youth to bring some water for his drink. Sumanā went to the river, filled his pitcher and, rising aloft, came by an aerial passage to serve the water, then, carrying the pitcher in his hand, he flew high in the air and, following his aerial course, came to the Jetavana grove where the Lord then sojourned. The Bhikshus were struck with wonder at the sight, and enquired about the history of this remarkable personage. The Lord said, "When the Lord Vipasyī dwelt at Bandhumati, there lived a rich merchant who, in his old age, seeing death imminent, worshipped the Lord, and prayed that he may be blessed with the absolute knowledge. That merchant is now born as Sumanā."

XVII. Story of Sthaviraka. There lived at Rājagṛha a rich householder, whose wife did not, on the tenth month of her pregnancy, bring forth a child. She conceived ten times afterwards, and brought forth ten sons, but her first conception remained in her womb. On her death, long after, her relatives proposed to open her belly to see what had become of her first conception. The Lord, with his followers, came to see the wonder, and lo ! when the womb was opened, there appeared an emaciated little dwarf, with his body covered with grey hairs, ensconced in the womb. The dwarf saluted the Lord and said, "None of you should use harsh words against your parents and teachers ; I did so, and have suffered for sixty years, confined in a noisome place." The Lord named him Sthaviraka "the old one." His father took him home and nursed him, and in a short time he grew up to a handsome man. On his 70th year he got himself ordained by the Lord, and became an Arhat. In explanation of the question why Sthaviraka had remained so long in the womb, the Lord said, "In the time of Jinendra Kāśyapa, a disciple of one Sthavira asked his tutor to go with him to Benares to behold a festival ; the tutor declined, whereupon the pupil said, 'Well, then, I must go alone, and you may remain here like an embryo in the womb.' That reproachful speech brought this punishment, for that pupil of your, is the Sthaviraka before us."

XIX. Story of Śrīmatī. King Vimbisāra had once given a handsome palace, named Jyotishka, to one of his sons, whereupon another, named Ajātaśatru, felt very much aggrieved, and, through the instigation of his friend Devadatta, killed his father, and himself became king. Subsequently, when out on a hunting expedition in a forest, he received salutary instruction from a Śramaṇa, and touched thereby, repaireing to the Lord Śākya Siṃha, repented of his sins, performed the purifying fast of Poshadha, and became a follower of Buddha. In explanation of the reason why Vimbisāra fell under the hands of his own son, the Lord said, Vimbisāra in a former life was a banker of Benares. Seeing a Pratyak Buddha in the way he had said, "these bald-pated vagabonds should have their feet decorticated with a razor," and that sin led to his feet being amputated by his son. He further stated that this Ajātaśatru was at first a great enemy of Buddhism. He did everything to thwart the true religion. Through the instigation of his friend Devadatta, he issued a proclamation that he would behead every person and escheat his property who evinced any regard for Buddhism or Buddhists. Once a lady, seeing a stūpa covered with dust, had it swept, and the news of this act being brought to Ajātaśatru he ordered her immediate decapitation, and the order was carried out. The spirit of the lady was transferred to heaven and, in her divine form, she came and worshipped the Lord.

XX. Story of Ajātaśatru's conversion. The subjects of Ajātaśatru rose against him for his opposition to Buddhism, and, other means failing, he felt obliged to betake to the asylum of the Lord to save his kingdom. Avadāna-śataka, story XVI.

XXI. Story of Dhanapāla. Given in Avadāna-śataka, story XXXIII, p. 27.

XXII. Story of Shaḍadanta. Brahmadata, anxious to destroy the credit of the Lord, consulted some wicked people, and induced them to depute to the Lord a young handsome woman, who should tell him that the embryo in her womb was due to him, and he should provide for the maintenance of herself and for the child about to be born. They soon found a woman ready to undertake this mission, tied a wooden bowl on her belly, dressed her up, and sent her to the Lord. She appeared before the Lord when he was seated amidst his followers, and made her request. At this juncture Indra, perceiving the mischief in contemplation, sent two mice to get within her dress, and to cut the fastenings of the wooden bowl. When the woman stood up to give emphasis to her claims, down dropped the unfastened bowl, and she was put to great shame. She cried loud, and begged that she may be at once burnt on a pyre. The Lord said, "This woman was inimical to me in a former life. There lived on the southern scarp of the Himālayas a six-tusked king elephant who had two wives, Bhadrā and Subhadrā; Bhadrā once saw her rival decorated with golden lotuses by her lord, and resolved to avenge herself. She repaired to a forest, worshipped an old saint, and prayed that she may, in her next birth, have the faculty of recalling to her mind the events of her former lives, and, becoming a queen, may enjoy life seated on a throne made of ivory from the tusks of a six-tusked elephant. Her prayer was granted, and she cast herself headlong from the edge of a precipice, and killed herself. She was then born as the daughter of Khanalita, and married to Brahmadata. When she had won the affection of her lord, she desired that a throne may be made for her of the ivory of a six-tusked elephant that lived on the Himālaya. The king deputed a hunter to bring the ivory, and the hunter, assuming the garb of a Bhikshu, appeared before the king elephant, which lived amidst 500 other elephants. The elephant, seeing that he was a Bhikshu, received him with respect, and enquired the object of his mission. The hunter confessed what he wanted, and pleaded his poverty for the repulsive work he had undertaken. The elephant, pitied his poverty, and, knocking his tusks against a rock, broke them, and gave them to him. Thus was the vow realized. I am that king elephant, and this woman, the daughter of a Tir-thika, was that Bhadrā."

XXIV. Story of Kṛtajña. When the Lord was once dwelling in the Jetavana grove at Śrāvastī, Devadatta intent on destroying the Lord, repaired to that place, and, standing before him prepared to carry out his intention, when the fire of the Lord's benevolence enveloped him, and burnt him down to ashes. The Lord, beholding him in hell-fire, related the following story: "There lived in the town of Ratighosha two brothers, one grateful, the other ungrateful. The former gave away a deal of his self-acquired wealth in charity, and started on a commercial voyage. His brother followed him. Their speculations proved highly successful, but, on the return voyage, the vessel of the two brothers encountered a hurricane, and was lost. Kṛtajña, the grateful, seeing his brother drowning, dragged him out, and, taking him on his back, swam to the shore with the help of a plank. He was greatly exhausted. His brother now revived, and, seeing that he had some precious jewels tied in his cloth, blinded him, and carried away the jewels. A kind merchant helped the now blinded man to come to the suburbs of Ratighosha, where he left him in the hut of a cow-keeper, and departed. The poor blind man had no wish to go home, so he lived on the charity of the cowherd. One day, the king's daughter, Janakalyānī by name, saw him, and fell in love with him. She married him, and nursed him, and brought him round. One day she was late in bringing him food, whereupon he accused her of inconstancy. She protested and said, "I know none but you, and should I be truthful and chaste, the merit thereof should restore one of your eyes." No sooner was this said, than one of his eyes opened, radiant like a lotus. The man was gratified, and said, "Though my ungrateful brother deprived me of my eyesight, I bear no ill-will against him, and if this be true, that truth should restore me my second eye." The second eye immediately opened as the first, and the happy couple returned to the palace, and the youth was anointed vice-king. The ungrateful brother, hearing of this, came to conciliate his brother, but, no sooner he stood before the grateful one, than he felt a fire burning within him. He cried out 'I am burnt, I am burnt,' and fell into hell-fire. "That grateful one" said the Lord, "is myself, and the ungrateful one Devadatta."

XXV. Story of Ajātaśatru's conversion. (Another version.) In course of time Ajātaśatru was afflicted with leprosy. His body was full of rotting sores, covered with noisome matter, and horribly stinking; his friends forsook him, and even his wife and children could not approach him. He groaned much, and, repenting of his sins, sought the asylum of the Lord. The Lord pitied him, and deputed Lokeśvara Bodhisattva for his conversion. Lokeśvara recommenced the Uposhadha fast, and dilated on its merits. Ajātaśatru faithfully performed the fast, took the shelter of the Three Jewels, and, becoming a Buddhist, disseminated that religion of the Lord in his kingdom.

A collection of Avadāna stories, related when the Lord sojourned at Śrāvastī in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. There are in it many stories, but most of them occur, in some form or other, in other Avadāna works. The name of the work does not occur in the Chinese Tripiṭhaka.

Contents. I. Story of Śroṇakoṭikarṇa. There lived in the village of Vāsava a rich householder who had born unto him a son with a jewelled ring in his ear. The boy was named Śroṇakoṭikarṇa. On the day in which this boy was born Bālasena a neighbour, got two sons, Dāsaka and Pālaka. When Śroṇakoṭikarṇa had grown up, he obtained the permission of his parents to proceed on a commercial tour in company with five hundred other commercial travellers. When returning home after a successful mission, he missed the company of his fellow travellers, and lost his way in the midst of an awful forest. Oppressed by thirst, he roamed about in quest of water, and at last came to a village inhabited by hobgoblins. These beings had enormous bellies, mouths not bigger than pin holes, and bodies covered with hair. On being asked the cause of their misfortune, they said, "For twelve long years, we have searched for water and have not yet got it. We were once men of Jambudvīpa, but, never having given any alms from our birth to our last day, we are doomed to this condition." Leaving their place, Śroṇakoṭikarṇa proceeded further, and at vesper came to a spot where he saw a man seated in a pavilion, and surrounded by four Apsaras maidens. This man received him kindly, entertained him hospitably, and allowed him to remain there for the night. Rising from his bed early in the morning, Śroṇakoṭikarṇa found that the pavilion had vanished, and the man was being torn to pieces by the four Apsaras who had assumed the form of brindled dogs. At nightfall the scene changed again; the pavilion re-appeared, and the man was seen dallying with the celestial maidens. On enquiring into the cause of these sudden transformations, the man said, "In my last existence I was a butcher, and would daily slaughter sheep and sell the meat, but at night I used to go to the saint Mahākātyāyana, and listen to his discourses and act according to his instruction ; hence it is that I am mangled during the daytime, and allowed to enjoy at night. My son is now carrying on our family profession in the village of Vāsava. Pray, tell him what you have seen, and try to restrain him from his profession ; induce him to go to Mahākātyāyana and offer him an alms-bowl for my redemption." Śroṇakoṭikarṇa promised to do as desired, and then retired.

Next morning he came to a place where he saw a pavilion in which a man was enjoying the company of celestial damsels. At nightfall the pavilion disappeared, and the damsels assumed the shape of a monster centipede, which held the man in its embrace and stung him continuously. When the sun rose the scene changed as before, and the man explained the occurrence by saying that in his preceding life he was a dissolute Brāhmaṇ at Vāsava ; he used to spend his nights with prostitutes, and devote the daytime to the service of Mahākātyāyana, and hence his diurnal enjoyment, and nocturnal suffering. He added, "Pray, tell my son that you have seen his father in his suffering, and that his father's earnest request is, that he should abstain from prostitution. Should he listen to you, pray, tell him to dig out from under our Agniśtoma altar a pitcher full of gold, and always offer alms to Mahākātyāyana."

Proceeding on, Śroṇakoṭikarṇa saw a lady seated on a bedstead in a pavilion, and four hobgoblins tied to the foot of the bedstead. When the hobgoblins were let loose to feed, one of them began to chew iron bullets, the second eat chaff, the third began to munch her own flesh, and the last appeared engaged on feasting on blood and pus. On enquiring of the cause, the lady said, "The one who is eating chaff is my daughter-in-law ; the next who is eating iron bullets is my husband ; the third who is eating her own flesh is my maid-servant, and the fourth who is eating blood and pus is my daughter. At a festival I prepared rich viands, and gave them first to Kātyāyana and Śramaṇas and then to Devas and Brāhmaṇas. Coming to know this, my husband, in great wrath, said, 'Why don't these bald-pated wretches eat iron bullets ?' and this is his punishment. Once, a relative of mine sent me some cakes ; my daughter-in-law ate them, and showed me only the vessel in which they had been sent, therefore she is made to feed on chaff. Again, once I prepared some cakes, and sent them through my daughter to a relative; she ate the cakes in the way, and gave the vessel to my relative, and when my relative sent me word, how it was that I had sent her only a pot? my daughter said, 'You then must have eaten the cakes and sent the pot?' Hence is she doomed to live on pus and blood. (The offence of the maid-servant is not related in the MS.) At the time when these offences were committed I expressed a wish that I may be permitted to see their retribution, and hence I see it now. You are going to Vāsava, pray, tell my only wilful daughter living there that you have seen her parents, and the punishment, they were under; advise her in my name that she should abstain from sin. There are buried in my father's room four iron chests full of golden ornaments. Let her take them out, enjoy them, and offer proper presents to Kātyāyana on behalf of me." Śroṇakoṭikarṇa lived at her place for twelve years, and was at last sent to Vāsava by the lady in her own vehicle.

Arriving at his native village, Śroṇakoṭikarṇa first repaired to the hermitage of Mahākātyāyana, and paid him his respects. Then he went to execute the commissions he had received in the wilderness, and at last returned home to the great joy of his sorrowing family. His narrative of what he had seen in his travels wrought a change in the mind of his son, who, no longer willing to remain at home, became a Bhikshu, and prevailed on his father to betake to the hermitage. The father was [ordained] an Arhat. In accounting for the conversions, the Lord said that in former times there lived at Benares the great saint Kāśyapa to whose memory king Kṛki had erected a chaitya. This chaitya was neglected and allowed to go to ruin during the reign of that king's son, but repaired by a merchant named Vānīyakara, and that merchant was now born as Śroṇakoṭikarṇa.

II. Story of Pūrṇa. There lived at the village of Surpāraka a merchant named Bhava who had three sons, Bhavila, Bhavatrātā, and Bhavanandi. When Bhava, was very ill, his wife and children neglected him on account of his habitual roughness of speech, but a slave girl tended him, obtained medical aid, and restored him to his wonted health. Bhava was greatly overcome by her kindness, and got by her a child named Pūrṇa. When Bhava died, Bhavatrātā and Bhavanandi proposed that all the family estate on land and at home should make one share, all that was on water or in foreign countries another, and Pūrṇa the third. Bhavila remonstrated against the scheme of partition, urging that Pūrṇa was a son of their father, and should have a share. The other brothers, however, would not assent to this, as Pūrṇa was slave-born and, being himself property, could not claim a share of the patrimony. The law being on their side, the original scheme had to be accepted, and Bhavila took Pūrṇa for his share. The two younger brothers then expelled from the paternal homestead the eldest and his family, who had to seek shelter in the house of a relation.

Driven away from home, Bhavila and his family were in great distress, and one morning, the children crying for breakfast, Pūrṇa took a māsha of gold and went to the market to procure some. On the seashore he met a man trembling from a drowning he had had in the sea and watching a raft of logs. Knowing the logs to be of Gośirsha sandal wood, he purchased the lot from the stranger for five hundred Kārshāpaṇas, and immediately after sold one of the logs for a thousand. With the money so obtained he placed his master's family in comfort. Soon after, physicians having recommenced an emolient of Gośirsha sandal wood to the king of the place to relieve him of the burning he was suffering from a high fever, Pūrṇa sold another log for a like sum. Cured of his fever, the king, thinking that it was unbecoming that the royal stores should not possess so valuable a remedy and it should be obtainable in the house of a poor man, ordered the whole lot to be purchased. This was done at a cost of three hundred thousand gold pieces. Thus enriched, Pūrṇa continued to trade, travelling from place to place, and amassed great wealth. At last he surrendered the whole of his property to his master, and, having repaired to the Lord, got himself ordained. Subsequently he retired to a place called Śroṇāpurantaka, to abide there. The people of that place were very rude and vain, but Pūrṇa, by his mildness, wisdom and assiduity, soon overcame them, made them resign Indra and the other Hindu gods to which they were attached, and betake to the fold of the Lord. About this time, Bhavila had gone in quest of Gośirsha sandal wood, and had employed five hundred labourers to fell the wood. A Yaksha who dwelt in that forest was offended at this, and created a hurricane to drown the ship in which Bhavila had come there. Bhavila cried in great distress for the succour of Pūrṇa, and Pūrṇa, coming to know of it through the medium of a god, flew to the place through the air, got the storm pacified, and obtained the permission of the Yaksha to carry away the wood. Returning with his brother to Surpāraka he caused a pavilion to be erected of that wood, and prayed that the Lord may come and occupy it. The message reached the Lord through the air, and the Lord at once came to the spot, and gratified the wish of his devotee. He tarried there for some time, and by his preachings and discourses converted many. In reply to the question why so pious a man as Pūrṇa should have been born of a slave girl, the Lord said that in the time of Kāśyapa he had, in a former life, once said of a Bhikshu "What slave girl's son is this man?" and for that fault he was doomed to be born of a slave-girl for five hundred births.

III. Story of Maitreya. When proceeding to the kingdom of Maha the Lord related the following account. On the death of his father, Praṇāda, Mahāpraṇāda ruled his country with great severity and injustice. Thereupon Indra, who was a friend of his father, came to him, and advised him to abstain from vice. Mahāpraṇāda said, "Put up some sign in my palace to remind me of virtue, and I shall follow it." Indra thereupon, set up in the palace a golden staff, a thousand fathoms high and 16 fathoms in girth. In connexion with this, the king announced a grand festival, and his uncle Aśoka became the administrator of charities. People from all parts of the earth assembled to enjoy the festival and behold the wonderful staff, neglecting their agricultural works. The result was a famine in the country. Disgusted at this, the king caused the staff to be cast into the river Ganges. "He who was Aśoka before," said the Lord, "is now Bhaṅgāli, the Bhikshu."

The Bhikshus asked, "When will this staff be rescued?" The Lord said, "When the duration of human life will be eighty thousand years, a king will be born of the name of Śaṅkha, and his wife, Brahmavati, will bear him a son of the name of Maitreya. This Maitreya will be a pupil of Brahmāyūh and will himself have eighty hundred pupils. Four great kings will recover this staff and present it to Śaṅkha, who will give it to Brahmāyūh. Brahmāyūh will give it to Maitreya, and Maitreya will present it to his pupils, who will divide it among themselves. When Maitreya will behold this partition, he will retire from the world and, attaining the perfect knowledge, become a Buddha. Him will follow Śaṅkha, his family and eighteen hundred chiefs, as also the family of Maitreya. Maitreya, followed by this retinue, will repair to the Gurupādaka hill, and there, taking up a bow of

In reply to the query, through what merit will Maitreya become a Buddha, the Lord said, that in the middle country there lived a king of the name of Vāsava. He was strictly just and religious and his country prospered. A king of the north country, Dhanasammata, envied this prosperity, and came down with a large army to plunder the wealth of the people. Vāsava went forth to meet him, and the opposing armies were encamped on the opposite sides of the river Ganges. At this juncture the great Buddha Ratnaśikhi came to the place, and took his station on the bank of the river, and Indra and other gods came to worship him. Seeing this, Dhanasammata made peace with Vāsava and retired to his country. Vāsava worshipped the Lord, and prayed that he may become an imperial sovereign. The blessing was granted, but it was to be effectual when human life would extend to eighty thousand years. Dhanasammata also worshipped the Lord, and prayed that he may become a moral ruler of mankind, and this too was granted on a similar condition. "This Vāsava", said the Lord, "will be Śaṅkha, and Dhanasammata, Maitreya."

IV. Story of Svāgata. There lived on the Śiśumāra hill a rich householder, named Buddha. He gave his daughter Rūpinī to the son of Anāthapiṇḍada. His wife then bore him a son named Svāgata. From the day the son was conceived, he suffered grievous misfortunes. When his son grew up he died; his house and his trading vessels and his corn stores were destroyed by fire. Svāgata tried to obtain his sustenance by begging, but none would give him alms. So at last, he sought the protection of his sister's husband. He reached his destination on the very day on which Anāthapiṇḍada had invited the Lord and his retinue. Eating of the remnant of food on the Lord's plate his mind was purified, and he was soon after ordained an Arhat. He then retired to his native place, and converted thousands.

To satisfy the curiosity of his audience the Lord said that formerly there lived a rich householder named Karvaṭaka. He was once in his garden with his family, relatives, and friends when a lean, weak, emaciated Pratyak Buddha entered the place in quest of alms. Karvaṭaka ordered his men to expel the intruder, but none obeyed his orders. He then himself seized the saint by the neck, and shoved him out. The poor beggar, weak as he was, sat down, and began to pray for the welfare of Karvaṭaka. This surprised the householder, and he prayed for pardon. It was immediately granted, and a blessing was also added that in a future life he would become a saint. That man is now born Svāgata.

VI. Story of Saṅgharakshita. Ditto, p. 64.

VII. Story of Kaṇakavarṇā. The text is here defective and the story breaks off after a few lines. The opening lines refer to a famine.

VII. Story of Chandraprabha Bodhisattva. When the Lord was on the Gṛdhrakūṭa hill, Maudgalyāyana, son of Sāri, vanished like a fire when the fuel had been burn out. The Bhikshus asked the Lord if this was his final deliverance, or the lot which his forefathers had been destined to? The Lord said, Maudgalyāyana had obtained final deliverance and not the lot of his forefathers, and then recounted the former history of the departed hermit. At a remote period there lived in the city of Bhadrāśīlā a king named Chandraprabha. He had established an alms-house at each of the four principal gates, of the city, and proclaimed that he would give whatever was asked of him. Thousands over thousands flocked at the gates, and got what they wanted, when at last a wicked Brāhmaṇ, named Rudrāksha, came and asked the king's head. Offers were made to him of untold wealth, but he would have nothing but the head. The king said, "Take then the best member of my body," and removed his crown for the beggar. The sight was horrifying to the two principal ministers. Mahāchandra and Mahīdhara, who fell down in a fit and died immediately. The beggar, seeing the company before him, and the feeling of rage and despair they displayed at his request, discreetly said that the king should retire alone to a private garden where he could be decapitated, but no witness should be present. The king assented, retired to his garden, closed its doors, and then recited a mantra, saying, "It is not for a kingdom, or for an empire, or for heaven, or for enjoyment, or for Brahmāhood that I give away my head to a Brāhmaṇ; I do so for the absolute Bodhi knowledge, acquiring which I may control the uncontrollable, restrain the unrestrainable, redeem the condemned, and quench the unquenchable. May my remains be preserved in a chaitya!" He then tied himself to a champaka tree, and ordered the beggar to do as he listed. The Brāhmaṇ decapitated him, took the head, and ran away. The Lord said, "The town which formerly was Bhadrāsīlā is now called Takshaśīlā. He who was king Chandraprabha is now myself; the two ministers are now Sārīputra and Maudgalyāyana;* and Rudrāksha, the beggar Brāhmaṇ, is Devadatta."

IX.—Story of Pañchaka. A Brāhmaṇ was one day seated in a very sorrowful mood, with one of his cheeks resting on his palm. An old woman asked him the cause. The Brāhmaṇ told her his wife was enciente, and expected to be delivered soon, and as all his former sons had died immediately after birth, he expected the same calamity soon. The woman said, "Send for me when she is about to be confined, and I will help you." On the day of delivery the old woman came, helped the patient, took the male child in her arms, filled his mouth with butter, covered it with a white cloth, and, handing him to a maid-servant, said, "Take this child to the market place, and, standing on the crossing, say to every Brāhmaṇ or Śramaṇa you meet, 'this child salutes you.' When the sun sets bring him back." This was done, and the child lived. He was named Mahāpañchaka. A second son was born, and he was saved in the same way. His name was Pañchaka. After the death of the Brāhmaṇ, Mahāpañchaka became a hermit, and was soon raised to the rank of an Arhat. Pañchaka was a stupid youth and could learn nothing, so his brother expelled him from the monastery, and he sat crying on the roadside. The Lord met him in the condition, directed a hermit to instruct him, and soon after ordained an Arhat.

To explain the reason for this sudden transformation, the Lord related the following stories. There lived in a market town a rich merchant who had an only infant son. Being required to proceed to a distant country on business, he deposited the bulk of his property in the custody of a friend, and, leaving only a small sum of money with his wife to meet household expenses during his absence, went away. He died out at sea, and his wife had great difficulty in bringing up her child. When the child had grown up to man's age, he went to his father's friend to beg assistance. The friend said, "He who has manly determination can help himself with that dead mouse ; he begs no one's help." The young man, being high spirited, felt deeply the force of the rebuke, and, taking up the dead mouse which was lying there and to which reference had been made, went away. While standing at the market-place with the dead mouse in his hand, a cat belonging to a shop-keeper pounced on the mouse, and carried it away. The shopkeeper gave him a quantity of kidney beans (māsha) as the price of the mouse. The youth parched the beans on a fire, took a pitcher of cool, clear water, and placed himself in the way by which some wood cutters returned from their daily work in a forest. The wood-cutters were greatly pleased with the refreshment at hand. Each took a handful of the parched beans and a draught of cold water, and gave the youth a piece of wood in return. A part of the wood so acquired was sold, and with the proceeds fresh beans were purchased, and parched, and the refreshment was taken to the wood-cutters as on the preceding day. In a short time the youth acquired enough wood to set up a fuel shop, and that proving lucrative, he had soon the means of trading on more precious articles. Prospering daily, he at last became a rich merchant ; but the humble means of his first venture was known to his neighbours, and they always called him Mushika-hairaṇyaka, or "mouse gold," and he wanted one day to pay off his debt regarding the mouse. He got four golden mice to be made, filled them with jewels, and, appearing before his father's friend, said "Here is the equivalent of the dead mouse you had lent, together with interest for the use of your capital." The friend, not to be outdone in generosity by the youth, said, "Here is the wealth that your father had deposited with me. Take it, and, as a reward for your manly determination and perseverance, I bestow on you my only daughter." The friend was the Lord in a former birth, and Pañchaka the youth.

* Sārī had seven sons of whom Upatishya alias Maudgalyāyana was a favourite disciple of Buddha. I cannot make out the proper name of the second. Sārīputra is obviously an epithet meaning, son of Sārī. Cf. pp. 45 &

In another birth Pañchaka was, under the name of Tripita, a pupil of Kāśyapa. He was proud and did not recite the Gāthās. In another existence he was a seller of hog's flesh. One day when ferrying across a river to a market, his boat was swamped, and he was carried away by the stream to a hermitage where five hundred Pratyak Buddhas resided. One of the saints rescued him from the river and revived him. He lived long with the saints and became a hermit.

On one occasion a Jivaka invited the Lord and his retinue to a sumptuous repast, but did not include Pañchaka in his list of guests. The Lord pointed out the omission, and it was recti-fied. When the guests arrived, the Jivaka did not offer welcome to Pañchaka, nor did he assign him a seat at the repast. The Lord noticed this and, instead of giving his plate to Ānanda, as usual, offered it to Pañchaka. Pañchaka prepared a miraculous seat on the air, and seated thereon, stretched out his hand like the trunk of an elephant to receive the plate. Surprised at this miracle the Jivaka fell at his feet, and begged to be pardoned. The Lord said, this is not the first time that this Jivaka has begged pardon of Pañchaka. In times of yore a horse dealer was passing by a village when one of his mares delivered a foal, the sight of which made his horses neigh loudly. This he took to be an inauspicious omen, and gave away the foal to a potter. He then went to king Brahmadata, and offered him his horses for sale. The king wanted a horse with particular marks on it, and this could not be found. The dealer then said, "The foal I have given to the potter has such marks." The potter sold the foal for a hundred thousand pieces of gold. One day the king rode this foal and went out of the city to his garden, where he was soon after surrounded by a band of rebels. The king mounted the foal and wanted to escape, but the road was besieged by enemies, and he could not go; the foal, thereupon, swam across a river and saved him. The dealer, coming to know of this, fell at the feet of the foal and begged his pardon. That foal was Pañchaka, and the dealer the Jivaka.

X. Story of Śyāmavātī. When the Lord was at Kulmāshadāmya, a hermit of the name of Mākandika offered him his daughter Anupamā to marry, but the Lord declined. An old man then advanced and offered to take the girl, but the father declined. The Lord said, "This is not the first time I have declined to take her," and related the following story. Formerly a blacksmith had resolved to give his daughter to the most proficient in his art, when a youth came to him and became his apprentice, and soon excelled him in art, but declined to receive the daughter when offered. The Lord was the youth and the blacksmith Mākandika.

To explain why the offer of the old man was declined, the Lord related with slight variations the story of Sindhala as given on pp. 96, 97. The story then runs that after the refusal, Mākandika went to Kauśāmbī, and gave his daughter to king Udayana, and himself became the king's chief minister. When the king had once gone out on an expedition against an enemy, Anupamā set fire to the inner apartments, which destroyed her five hundred rivals including the chief queen Śyāmāvati. On Udayana asking the Lord the history of these five hundred wives, the lord said, formerly king Brahmadata, of Benares, had five hundred wives. One day these ladies had gone to a garden for recreation. Bathing in an adjoining river they felt cold, and the chief queen, seeing a hut on the bank, ordered her maid to set fire to it, so that she may have a good blazing fire to warm herself. The maid reported that the hut belonged to a hermit. But the queen did not care for this, and insisted upon her order being carried out, and her companions supported her. The hut was accordingly burnt. The hermit escaped from the hut, and, rising high in the air blessed her, whereupon they all begged that they may be duly punished for their sins, but after that they may obtain the absolute knowledge. Śyāmāvati and her companions were those ladies of yore.

XI. Story of Nanda or Kauśidya-vīryotsāha Avadāna. Nanda, the son of a rich merchant, became a cripple in his youth. His family priest, Pūraṇa, tried his utmost to cure him, but failed. At last the Lord, hearing of his utter inability to rise from his bed, came to see him, when lo! the youth jumped out of his bed to offer him welcome. The visit cured him completely, and he started for Ceylon on a mercantile mission. On his return after a successful voyage, he invited the Lord, and offered him and his followers rich presents, praying at the same time that he may in a future life become a Buddha. The prayer was granted.

XVIII. Story of a poor Brāhmaṇ or Chhinna-bhakta-brāhmaṇa Avadāna. When the Lord was proceeding on foot to Śrāvastī, he met a poor Brāhmaṇ returning from his field with a plough on his shoulders. Perceiving that the traveller bore on his person the thirty-two auspicious marks, but was oppressed with fatigue, the Brāhmaṇ brought out from his hut a cupful of pure cool water, and offered it to the Lord. The Lord ordered it to be cast into an adjoining dried-up, old, neglected well; and as soon as the Brāhmaṇ did so, the well filled up to the brim with the clearest, sweetest cold water. The Lord and his followers refreshed themselves with this water, and then, preaching the true religion to the Brāhmaṇ, retired. The next morning when the Brāhmaṇ went to his field, he found it covered with waving corn with ears loaded with grains of gold. Wonder-struck at the sight of the barley which he had sown the day before, growing up so rapidly and bearing grains of gold, the poor man went to the king, and reported the occurrence. The king caused the crop to be harvested and divided into two equal shares, one for himself and the other for the cultivator. When the division was made and the shares duly made over to their respective owners, the grains which fell to the lot of the king changed to ordinary grains of barley. The division was repeated again and again for seven times, and every time the king's share underwent the wonderful change, and thereupon he ordered the whole crop to be given to the cultivator, who spent it in alms and other benevolent work.

XIX. Story of five hundred cultivators or Pañchaśatakrṣhakāvadāna. Proceeding from the hut of the poor Brāhmaṇ, the Lord met in the way five hundred cultivators, who prayed that they may be at once ordained and were made Arhats. These men in a former life had been ordained Bhikshus by Kāśyapa, but they had relapsed into evil ways, and therefore had been punished for a long series of generations by being made cultivators.

XX. Story of an agricultural Brāhmaṇ or krṣhaka-brāhmaṇāvadāna. This is the story of Chandra as given on p. 298.

XXI. Story of Rūpāvatī or Rūpāvatyavadāna. Once when the Lord was at the Jetavana monastery his disciples remarked, how wonderful it was that beggars should be the most favoured of all persons to the Lord. The Lord replied, it was even so in his former existences, and then recited the following story in illustration. At Utpalāvatī in the northern country (Uttarāpatha), there lived at one time a lady of great beauty and highly virtuous disposition, whose name was Rūpāvatī. Once when in a monastery she saw a famished woman confined there and that person, under the pangs of hunger was about to eat her own infant son. Having nothing at hand to give, she cut off her breasts and gave them to the famished woman. On return home she related the circumstance to her husband, who declared that such incomparable virtue deserved to be rewarded with the restoration of the busts, and the breasts immediately grew up to their natural size. Thereupon Śakra, assuming the form of a Brāhmaṇ, appeared before her and asked, "Did you feel no hesitation in giving away your busts?"

"No," replied she.

"Why did you do so?" "To save the life of the child. I long not for kingdom, or wealth, or supremacy; I yearn for the absolute knowledge, which would enable me to rescue the fallen, redeem the lost, and restore mankind to eternal beauty. I wish therefore to become a man."

The wish was immediately gratified by the blessing of Śakra, and the name of the metamorphosed lady became Rūpāvata, and she was elected king of Utpalāvati. On her death after a reign of 60 years, she was born as the son of a merchant, and was named Chandraprabha, because his beauty outshone that of the moon. When he was eight years old, he went one day to a cremation ground and, cutting his flesh bit by bit, gave it to vultures to feed upon. When he lay helpless, the birds plucked out his eyes from their socket, and he died. He was next born in that town as the son of a Brāhmaṇ, named Brahmaprabha on account of the unrivalled effulgence of his body. When he attained the age of sixteen years, he retired to a forest and, making a hut there, passed his time in the exercise of the most rigorous asceticism. In the neighbourhood of his hut he one day saw a famished tigress which had lately brought forth two cubs and was about to eat them. He immediately gave his own body to the tigress, and saved the cubs. "The town," said the Lord, "which was Utpalāvati before is now Pushkalāvata. She who was Rūpāvati before, is now myself. The woman who was confined in the monastery, next became the tigress. Those who were the parents of Brahmaprabha next became Śuddhodana and Māyā, and the two cubs are now Ānanda and Rāhula."
